"We have strictly in every instruction we have issued—and the Papers upon the Table prove the fact—that we have insisted on the strict fulfilment of the spirit and the letter of the Treaty of Waitangi. Our instructions have upon that point been uniform. They were given to Captain Fitzroy; and whatever instructions may have been since despatched to his successor, they have, in this respect, remained unaltered. We have told him—our declarations to the effect have been reiterated—that while he should seek, in every possible mode, to promote the amicable settlement of the affairs of the New Zealand Company, that he should always consider it to be the paramount duty devolved upon him, specially, and scrupulously, and religiously to fulfil our solemn engagements with the natives of New Zealand."

And while everybody knows the interpretation which the noble Lord puts upon the strict and religious fulfilment of those solemn engagements, viz., that the land which he declares to be the property of the natives, as much as the estate of any man in England or Scotland is his property, the noble Lord sent out instructions to the Governor to put a tax upon that land for the purpose of confiscating it. If the Government wish to preserve the engagement the noble Lord so described, let them do it strictly and honourably. If they thought the New Zealanders were competent to make Treaties with us, and were as much the proprietors of those lands as the people of Scotland and England were of their estates, respect their rights; but would not all mankind cry out against us, if, when taking possession of Martinique, Guadaloupe, and Canada, and having guaranteed the inhabitants in the undisturbed possession of their lands, we had put a tax upon the land for the avowed purpose of confiscating it? The phrase thimble-rigging had been applied in reference to transactions of this kind; but there was a practice formerly prevalent in this country, which, as describing a fraud, was much more analogous—the old trick of ring-dropping:—the course being to drop a ring, and then ask some unsuspecting person whether he had dropped it; and, while pretending to share with him the good fortune, to filch from him his money. And this was the way in which the noble Lord was about to fulfil his interpretation of the engagements of the Waitangi Treaty. Having asserted that those engagements should be maintained, instructions were given to fulfil them by a wild-land tax registration. I can assure the House I have not come here to complain without having exhausted every means to obtain justice from the Government, and without a conviction, that so long as the present spirit prevails in the Colonial Department against the New Zealand Company, there is no hope either for the Company or the colonists—and in speaking of the colonists, I mean not only the settlers of the Company who form the largest portion of the European inhabitants, but of the Colony generally, the best interests of which are involved in this question. I trust the House will not leave New Zealand to the spirit which is in operation at the Colonial Department for the next six months, without any guarantee for the future, not only of law, but without any intimation on the part of the Government, and without any declaration on the part of the House, that they expect the Government to alter a policy that has been so fatally prejudicial; and I do trust, that the answer of the House to the petitions of the friends and connexions of the colonists, presented this night, will not be, that they are prepared to support Lord Stanley's instructions and speeches, in contradiction to the promises of the right hon. Baronet. The hon. and learned Member concluded by moving—

"That this House regards with regret and apprehension the state of affairs in New Zealand; and that those feelings are greatly aggravated by the want of any sufficient evidence of a change in the policy which has led to such disastrous results."

Mr. G. W. Hope asked what was the statement made by the hon. and learned

Member—what was the whole gravamen of his charge against his noble Friend? It was that he had not read to the deputation certain parts of the instructions given to the Governor of New Zealand. This he (Mr. Hope) most distinctly denied. His noble Friend positively stated that the parts of the instructions referred to—those of the 27th of June, had been read to the deputation. Now it was said that his noble Friend should have adopted some means to guard himself against any such misunderstanding. Why, what course could he have adopted but that actually taken? The noble Lord met gentlemen of high honour, for confidential communication, in private: a discussion took place; it was agreed that the result of that discussion should be recorded in minutes, and the minutes were agreed to by both parties. Those minutes distinctly stated that the extracts to which the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard had referred were communicated to the deputation, and that a certain despatch was given to them in extenso; and yet in the face of that minute. an hon. Member charged the noble Lord with acting in bad faith, as having kept back the very documents which it is there recorded were produced and read. The minutes stated that Lord Stanley promised to send to the deputation, in a course of a few days, copies or extracts of his despatches to Governor Grey; and that, till they were forwarded to the deputation, the communication of their contents made that day should be considered confidential. The documents sent were then read. He (Mr. Hope) believed there was only one hon. Gentleman in the House who was a member of that deputation; and he certainly should be surprised if that hon. Gentleman contradicted the assertion he now made. He thought the House would be of opinion that he had satisfactorily disposed of the charge. But he might mention a circumstance which enabled Lord Stanley to state with more confidence that the extract to which the hon. and learned Member opposite had referred, was shown to the deputation. It would be found, on referring to the end of the extract, that it contained the following passage:—

"I can only repeat to you (Captain Grey) the instructions which I have already given to Captain Fitzroy, to endeavour by amicable co-operation with Colonel Wakefield, to remove obstacles arising from unsatisfied native claims, and to discourage, as far as lies in your power, any exorbitant or extortionate demands on the Company on this head."

Now, it so happened that the word "exorbitant" had been accidentally misprinted "exhorbitant," and when the passage was read, his noble Friend pointed out the absurdity of the blunder. The circumstance was a slight one; but it was amply sufficient to prove that the note had been duly read to the deputation. Yet upon such grounds, were charges brought against his noble Friend—upon such grounds had charges of deceit been levelled against him. [Mr. C. Buller: I did not accuse him of deceit.] So it was, at least, that he understood the hon. Gentleman; but he must be allowed to state, that whatever might be the view taken of the matter by the hon. Gentleman, his noble Friend felt that such had been the real nature of the charge urged against him. He had received a statement, accusing him of having intentionally kept the Company in the dark on this point; and it was his (Mr. Hope's) duty to show how slight were the grounds upon which such accusations were brought forward. If the noble Lord had erred at all, he considered it to have been in the confidence and frankness with which he had received and communicated with those who had made him the object of their attacks. He would now pass from this part of the subject. The hon. and learned Gentleman had dwelt upon the inconsistency of Lord Stanley's administration with respect to New Zealand. The hon. and learned Gentleman complained that the promises held out to the Company by the right hon. Baronet near him had not been fulfilled. It was not for him to attempt to defend his right hon. Friend; but he might point with confidence to the spirit of the instructions laid before that House and communicated to the Company, as evincing a real sincere bonâ fide desire on the part of the Government to meet the demands of the New Zealand Company, so far as they could do so consistently with their duty to the country, and their obligation to maintain the honour of the Crown. The hon. and learned Gentleman had not read the instructions to which he had urged objections; but he (Mr. Hope) might be allowed to read some portions of them. Let him turn to the following passage in the despatch of the noble Lord, dated the 27th of June:—

"In my despatch of the 13th instant, I ad-verted shortly to the relations between Her Majesty's Government and the New Zealand Company. The early settlement of the pending questions respecting the Company's claims to land is of paramount importance towards the adjustment of the affairs of the Colony; and it is far more necessary to take effectual steps for bringing these discussions to a final and, if possible, a satisfactory conclusion, than to re-open questions of strict right, or carry on an unprofitable controversy."

Now, he would appeal to the House whether this passage evinced any hostile or unfriendly spirit on the part of the Government towards the New Zealand Company. Notwithstanding the attacks which had been made upon Lord Stanley, in connexion with this subject, he received a deputation from the Company; he did not hesitate to produce his despatches to them, and to communicate their purport; he courted their remarks, and yet it was said that he had shown no disposition to consult them, or to carry out promises which were supposed to have been made with reference to the establishment of an improved state of public affairs in New Zealand. The hon. and learned Member for Liskeard had complained that the Company were placed in a worse position than they would otherwise have been in, because an unheard-of condition had been imposed upon them —the acceptance of the Commissioner's award by the natives. From the manner in which the hon. and learned Gentleman's statement on this point was made, he could see that it had had some effect upon the House; and he might be allowed to afford an explanation of the matter, though such an explanation would scarcely be necessary to hon. Gentlemen who had read the despatch of the 6th of July. It would be remembered that early in July, 1843, the Company applied to Lord Stanley to direct his officers to co-operate with their agents in compensating the natives of New Zealand who might have sold their lands, or who complained that they had not received sufficient compensation for land sold. Lord Stanley consented to issue such instructions, and he did issue them. Governor Fitzroy delegated to Mr. Spain, the Commissioner, the duty of conducting these negotiations between the natives and the Company's agents; and the Commissioner had consequently a double duty to perform. In the one case he had to adjudicate judicially on the question of sale or no sale; in the other, in conformity with the request of the Company, it was his duty to negotiate with the natives for the arrangement of unsatisfied claims. In some cases awards of further compensation had been made by the Commissioner to natives whose claims had remained unsatisfied. But these awards were not made by the Commissioner judicially; they were made by him in the character of a mediator between the two parties; and it depended upon the natives whether or not they would accept the compensation that might be tendered to them. In a letter of the 8th of May, 1843, from the New Zealand Company, it is requested that the Governor and Council of New Zealand may be instructed—

"As soon as practicable, to establish some general rule for defining native titles, and settling the claims to land, and to do their best to aid the agents of the Company in effecting the necessary arrangements with the natives, either for the purchase of lands belonging to them, but unimproved, or for making, on the part of the Company, equitable compensation for the original value of land which may have been occupied by themselves or their settlers, without sufficient title, but on which they may have effected improvements."

In pursuance of these directions the Commissioner acted, and he acted upon them as mediator in Wellington, and almost every other settlement. The award of the Commissioner, in a judicial capacity, might have been against the Company; but, as a mediator, his suggestions might be admitted and accepted by the natives. This measure, therefore, so far from being inconsistent with the rights of the Company, was in his opinion, the very course of all others most calculated to effect their objects, and to lead to the peaceful, the immediate, and final settlement of the questions at issue in the Colony. But he would now turn to the more general questions to which the hon. and learned Gentleman had alluded. That hon. Member had begged that Lord Stanley would not shift from himself to the Governor of New Zealand any responsibility which properly belonged to him. It was unnecessary for him to defend the noble Lord from the suspicions of any desire to commit so discreditable an act; but on the other hand he (Mr. Hope) must ask that his noble Friend should not be made responsible for consequences which could not be attributed to his proceedings. The hon. and learned Gentleman had referred at some length to the present condition of the settlement of Auckland, and had thought proper to quote the account given by Mr. Cormack, without alluding to any other letters received from the Colony, or to the despatches received by Her Majesty's Government. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said that there was congregated at Auckland a mob of runaway sailors, convicts, and other persons of bad character; and he took the opportunity of stating that there were in the Colony a number of boys from the Penitentiary at Parkhurst. He thought that when the hon. and learned Gentleman attributed the present condition of New Zealand in some degree to the fact that twenty-five boys from Parkhurst had been located in the Colony, it was evident that he was anxious to seize upon every circumstance which he imagined could excite any feeling in his favour, or create alarm in the public mind as to the condition of the Colony. He (Mr. Hope) would state the real circumstances with reference to these boys. It was determined some years ago to try an experiment which had been strongly recommended—that of giving to boys who had been criminally convicted, but who had received education, and who were believed to be reformed characters, a chance of beginning a new life in a new world. In pursuance of that determination, boys whose characters were vouched for by the superintendent of Parkhurst were sent to several of the Colonies, and among others to New Zealand. He regretted that a disposition should have been shown by any hon. Member of that House to shut out the reformed convict from the only chance of retrieving his character. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said that the settlers at Auckland were in a state of great alarm: he would ask permission to read to the House two extracts from letters from Auckland which had to-day been forwarded to him by his noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies, the one dated the 20th and the other the 25th of March. In the former it was stated that the disaffection only extended to a few tribes in the north, that those in the neighbourhood of Auckland seemed to be well disposed, although they were not to be fully trusted. The writer, however, concluded with the remark, that "we may expect all to pass over without anything serious taking place." This was the letter of the 20th. In that dated the 25th, the same writer went on to state, that since the arrival of the North Star troop ship, bringing 200 men of the 58th regiment, the public mind had become calmed, and the news from the different tribes was sufficiently satisfactory. Now, this was the statement of one who had no interest in making out a favourable case for the local authorities. It was true that the hon. Member had read a letter of the 28th; but it so happened that he (Mr. Hope) had a newspaper published at New Zealand upon the 29th, from which he would read an extract—

"On Sunday last there arrived here 230 of the 58th regiment, with six field pieces from Sydney, in Her Majesty's ship North Star, and the schooner Velocity. These reinforcements, with the excellent precautionary measures of putting the barracks in a complete state of defence, erecting blockhouses in various directions, and strong patroles and pickets nightly around the town, impart feelings of security to the inhabitants, at the same time intimating to the native population in the adjacent districts, that any hostile or preparatory attempts on their part on Auckland, would be met by most determined powerful resistance."

Here was a statement which did not agree with the representations of Mr. Cormack. But then the hon. Gentleman stated that in defending Auckland we had withdrawn protection from Wellington. Now, so far from that being the case, the fact was, that upon the arrival of the general reinforcement from Sidney, the first step taken, was to send special reinforcements from Auckland to Wellington. Yet the hon. Gentleman had gone on to declare, that Government was guilty of culpable negligence with respect to the state of military preparations at New Zealand, and that for this negligence Lord Stanley was responsible, Captain Fitzroy having repeatedly applied to him for additional military force, but without effect. This was the statement of the hon. Member; but he had not been able to point to those despatches of Governor Fitzroy, in which this demand for military assistance was urged, although all these documents had been laid upon the Table of the House. It was somewhat hard, then, under these circumstances, to turn round and say, why have you not complied with requests, the existence of which has still to be proved? In fact, the only statement of the kind alluded to by the hon. Member was, a general statement to be found in the despatch of the 14th of April. In this document it was stated, that none of the establishments—and this referred to civil and military establishments—would admit of reduction; but that, on the contrary, they ought rather to be increased. But really that was not the species of demand which could be called a regular application for increased force; and besides, the argument for the increase of establishments came with very bad grace from the hon. Gentleman, who considered these very establishments as being excessive. The first explicit demand for reinforcements was received on the 29th of March or May last—at the moment he did not recollect which—and the statement of Captain Fitzroy to his Council was made on the 26th of March. But as he was upon the subject of military and naval protection to New Zealand, it might be satisfactory to the House, and to those who were interested in the Colonies, were he to state what, in respect to this matter, had been the course already taken, and that which was proposed in future to be adopted. In the first place, then, the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Russell) had decided, that 100 men was to be the total force allotted to New Zealand. A force of that amount was accordingly sent out. Remonstrances were, however, made as to its insufficiency, and the noble Lord replied that he was sorry for it, but that he had no stronger force, and that they must be content with the 100 men allotted to them. The next correspondence which took place upon the subject was one which had been printed and laid before the House; and it appeared from the documents contained in it, that from 150 to 250 men and a ship of war were all that the military authorities in the island considered to be required. A reinforcement was accordingly sent, and a vessel of war ordered to be constantly stationed near New Zealand. In addition to this, his noble Friend had directed the immediate enrolment of a militia. His intention was, however, not carried into effect, and he might state distinctly, that disregard of the instructions sent from home in this respect, was one of the reasons which had led to the dismissal of Captain Fitzroy. But what had been the course lately pursued as to the defence of the Colony? His noble Friend had directed a regiment to be sent out to New Zealand, and had caused application to be made to the admiral on the Indian station for a steamer, while measures had been adopted for relieving the vessel of war by another as efficient, if not more so than herself. They must not, however, forget, in considering this question, the amount of force in the Australian Colonies; that consideration had a very important bearing upon the question. What, then were the facts as to the force in Australia? Why, there were 1,600 more men there now, than there had been in 1841. Instead of 2,400, the number then stationed there, there were now upwards of 4,000. It would be evident, therefore, that there was a large available force stationed in those Colonies, and, as the distance between Auckland and Sydney was not above ten days' sail, that force would be enabled to be employed in the defence either of the one Colony or the other. Not, however, that he entertained any great dread that a large military force would be necessary for the purposes of New Zealand. He would remark, that there existed there no confederation of natives against Europeans. Indeed, the safety of British power had always been considered to lie in the disunion of the aboriginal tribes; and there were no grounds for supposing that the natives would now unite against us, unless some act were committed which should give them what they never yet possessed—common sympathies and a common object. "But," said the hon. Gentleman, "the recent disturbances had arisen from our policy in New Zealand;" and in the same breath he contended that these disputes had not their origin in any cause connected with land. The hon. Gentleman had referred to Mr. Busby's view of the matter, Mr. Busby's view was that the dissatisfaction of the natives arose from a limitation being imposed upon them as to their power of selling their land to whomsoever they pleased. Why, there was no witness the hon. Gentleman could call, who was more completely opposed to his views, than was Mr. Busby. But, then, in the opinion of Mr. Cormack, the late riots had their origin in the natives having been cheated. Where had they been cheated? How had they been cheated? By whom had they been cheated? The hon. Member answered none of these questions. But, they were told by others, that the natives became disaffected, because, they found greater restrictions upon their proceedings in the way of selling land than they anticipated. They urged, that we undertook to buy their lands from them, but that, if we did not so buy them, they had a right to sell to somebody else. They said, "When we gave you a right of pre-emption, we did not mean to imply that you should be the only purchasers, but simply that you should have the first offer." In fact, the disturbances arose from dissatisfaction against the regular Government, from dissatisfaction with the impediments placed upon the sale of lands; and also they arose, he believed, from the desire on the part of the native chief who had led them to win for himself a reputation, to gain a character for warlike achievements, and to raise himself in the estimation of his countrymen, by denying the authority of the Queen of England. But then it was said that his noble Friend had supported Captain Fitzroy almost at all hazards, that never had a Governor been so backed, that almost his every action had been ratified and approved of. Now, he would like to know on what authority such statements were made. It was very true, that his noble Friend had said, so long as the charges were but one-sided accusations, that he would not on such ex-parte statements recall the late Governor; he would wait, in the first place, for Captain Fitzroy's own statement and defence. That statement was made, and he was recalled. So far from approving of almost all Captain Fitzroy's proceedings, his noble Friend disapproved of it on almost all important points. He disapproved of his financial policy, of his proceedings as to the sale of land, of his doing away with custom-house restrictions in the Bay of Islands. He disapproved of his proceedings in regard to the militia, and of the unusually rapid, hasty, and inconsiderate course which he adopted in passing, in a Council sitting at one end of the island, without allowing sufficient time for communication with the other, laws by which the whole was to be governed. But, then, said the hon. Member, what was the course now proposed to be adopted? And here he must remark on the attack which the hon. Gentleman had seen fit to make upon Mr. Shortland. He was sorry that the hon. Gentleman had thought it necessary to do anything of the kind. Mr. Shortland had been Secretary to the Colonial Government, but his appointment was not the work of his noble Friend. He had served with credit as a lieutenant in the navy; it was true that complaints of malversation had been made against him, but the charges were not supported, and he was acquitted; and the reason of his resigning his office was in consequence of Captain Fitzroy making it manifest that he reposed no confidence in him. It was considered most unjust and cruel to condemn a man for life because an unfounded charge was brought against him. It was his noble Friend's intention, therefore, though this gentleman was not considered competent to preside over the government of New Zealand, to appoint him to one of the minor presidencies of a West India Island. The hon. and learned Gentleman then came to the question of the policy on which the government of New Zealand should be conducted. To this part of the subject the hon. Gentleman's Resolution was pointed in as vague a manner as possible with the view of catching the votes of those who did not agree with his views. When the hon. and learned Gentleman came to particulars, a strong ground of attack seemed with him to be, that Auckland was made the capital instead of Wellington. Now the instructions issued by the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) in April 1841, specially provided that Captain Hobson, who was sent out by him, should see that the New Zealand Company had no portion of the capital, and that it should be reserved to the Government alone. The words were—"Lands to be assigned to them, should not embrace any part of the future capital. It is indispensable to reserve to the Crown the command over all lands in the capital town, as well as any that may be embraced in the suburbs." It was, therefore, clear that Captain Hobson went out with distinct instructions from Lord John Russell not to place the capital in the lands of the Company. But he did not defend the selection on that ground alone. Every impartial person from the Colony he had spoken to, testified that Auckland was the best selection that could have been made. The hon. and learned Gentleman had next taunted his noble Friend with the promise of "municipal government," and ridiculed the idea of granting institutions which only gave the power of paving and lighting. Now, he asked the House, was this reading his noble Friend's instructions in their spirit? His noble Friend stated what he gave them as a substitute for representative government—that he included large districts to obviate the unequal pressure of taxation; and yet the hon. and learned Gentleman would give the House to understand that the powers granted by his noble Friend were restricted to the narrow limits of "paving and lighting;" limits which, according to the hon. and learned Gentleman's own statement, would be perfectly inapplicable to the state of New Zealand. But then the hon. and learned Gentleman said the instructions deceived the Company. [Mr. Buller: No, that they were misled by them.]

Well, taking it in that way, it was admitted the instructions were submitted to the Company, and they had an opportunity of discussing them. His noble Friend's object in showing the Company the extract from his instructions, was in order to obtain their views. And he thought when his noble Friend acted in a spirit of candour, and fairness, and invited discussion, it would have been better for the Company to suggest modifications—to point out their views at the time, and not to receive them without objection, and subsequently, when convenient to themselves, to turn round and endeavour to give a meaning to those instructions which they were not intended to bear. As to his noble Friend's declaration that he would adhere to the Treaty of Waitangi, entertaining, as his noble Friend did entertain, a decided and fixed opinion that the obligations of the Crown imposed that view upon him, he would be unworthy of his high station if he permitted any notions of temporary convenience, or any desire to conciliate a particular body of men, to induce him to swerve from that course. Moreover, so far from late events disproving the justness of his noble Friend's views, they showed demonstrably that they were founded in good policy, as well as in justice, honour, and good faith; and that to depart from them, as it would unite the whole native tribes by one common and just cause of dissatisfaction, would go further than any other course that could be suggested, to shake at once the character and power of the British Government in New Zealand. The hon. and learned Gentleman next referred to the tax on the wild lands, and he censured it strongly. Why, the hon. and learned Gentleman, in his own Report, recommended such a tax on the wild lands of Canada, and nobody found fault with that recommendation, though Canada was a conquered Colony, and French Canadians owners of wild lands. It was plain by the mode he dwelt on it, that the hon. and learned Gentleman considered this the only weak point of his noble Friend's case; but it was hard that his noble Friend should be condemned for an incidental observation approving the same view as that taken in the solemn Report of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and that his noble Friend should be called a "thimble-rigger" and "ring-dropper" for adopting the same recommendation as to New Zealand, whicht he hon. and learned Gentleman gave as to Canada. Besides this attack on the noble Lord, he might also be allowed to refer to what he considered an unfair charge against himself. In the late debate the hon. Member for Lambeth said, that he (Mr. Hope) had voted in 1840 against the recognition of the independence of New Zealand. Be it so. But was there any inconsistency in saying it was unwise to admit the independence of New Zealand, but that, having admitted it, we were bound to adhere to a particular policy to give effect to what he might have considered in the first instance an erroneous view of the question? The Report of that Committee distinctly stated that a proper remedy could only be applied by legislation to the evils which then existed. To revert, however, to the question really before the House, after his many miscellaneous attacks, the hon. and learned Gentleman came at last to what was the gist of his Resolutions, drawn as they were to bring within their scope as much sympathy from all sides as possible. He spoke of a change of policy. These were wide words; but the meaning of them was simple—it was to obtain for the Company the land to which it was their wish to be declared entitled to be given to them, by being taken away without compensation from the natives. That was the change of policy which he stated was expected. On what ground was such a change expected? Was there not the strongest declaration of an intention to keep faith with the natives of New Zealand? They (the Opposition) might say that the recognition of their rights was a wrong course; but to that Government was pledged by the acts of the noble Member for London, and by no act of their own. He should not fatigue the House by discussing the noble Lord's instructions; but they could have proceeded on no ground but on a recognition of a title to the soil of New Zealand in the natives, and that they alone owned the waste lands which the noble Lord's Officers were instructed to purchase from them. Had there been any fresh intelligence to change these views? If the hon. and learned Gentleman looked to the Minutes of the Executive Council of New South Wales, he would find that not much encouragement was held out to change the policy which was thus rendered indispensable by the acts of the predecessors of the present Ministers. The House would recollect that in the late debate, the Report of Sir G. Gipps was frequently referred to, particularly by the Chairman of the Committee, the noble

Member for Sunderland. Sir G. Gipps was applied to by Captain Fitzroy for aid before the breaking out of the last disturbance, and he observed, before Lord Stanley's despatch was received—commenting on the Report of the New Zealand Company—

"The present application was not founded on a single act of violence, and he felt convinced that the difficulty of keeping in check the natives would be more extensively felt in proportion as the Report of the House of Commons' Committee of July should become more generally known throughout the Colony."

He could state that that was no visionary apprehension; and that it was the opinion of every one well acquainted with the Colony, that if there was any question likely to unite the natives into a compact mass, it was the question as to their rights to land, denied by the Committee; and, in conclusion, so far from promsing a change, he must warn the House against that other line of policy pressed for by the hon and learned Member, which would, in his opinion, amount to spoliation, and which would be as inconsistent with the honour of the Crown as with the peace and good government of the Colony.

Mr. Roebuck said, many of the difficulties which beset this question were to be traced to the manner in which we became entitled to New Zealand. They would be found not to result from the acts of any one Government, but from the course of policy which had been pursued with regard to the Colony. He should shortly give the history of this Colony; for on the good foundation of our title rested the solution of many of the difficulties which we had to encounter. In 1769, Captain Cook, under the authority of the Crown, discovered this territory. According to international law, to give us any right to possession of the discovery, the voyage of discovery must have been prosecuted under the authority of a Crown. This, however, was but an inchoate right, liable to be annulled by non-user or formal abandonment. We did not take possession of New Zealand by any authorized colonization. Some runaways from New South Wales, some mariners connected with the whale fishery, and some missionaries (of whom he had a word to say presently), who thought they were "labouring in the vineyard," occupied by degrees this territory. The right we gained by discovery thus remained unperfected. By a great many Acts of Parliament, Great Britain solemnly disavowed its title; and further, that the sovereignty existed in the New Zealand chiefs. It was not for him to say whether this course was wise or not; but if any foreign nation had supposed they were not precluded by our priority of discovery, and invaded the country, we should have fallen back on the declaration which we made, and said, "This is an independent country—it is so acknowledged by us—and we shall see that the rights and liberties are not endangered." A Company was next formed (and it would puzzle his hon. Friend the Attorney General to answer this position) for the purpose of conducting emigration to New Zealand. That would be an illegal act, if this was a wild territory. The Company had a right to say, "We went out to this country on the character acknowledged by yourselves—that of an independent and sovereign community; and we bought the lands from the people, you say, who possessed the sovereignty." Lord Stanley, by some powers of divination, said the intentions of the natives were not such as were supposed. The Company answered, "We paid for the land; we paid what your 'sovereign rulers' considered a fair price; and we say, you have no right to look at the contract, or to annul it by proclamation." Now, that was a nice legal question, which he should like to see submitted to the Queen's Bench; and he would wager they would not decide with the Government. When those parties went out in 1839, the intermeddling of France was dreaded. What did we? We made Captain Hobson not only Captain General of New Zealand, but we also invested him with consular power, thereby admitting the people to whom he was accredited to be an independent nation. We also gave ambassadorial powers, and authorized him to treat with the chiefs. What could be more solemn acknowledgments of sovereignty? Proceedings went on. This half Ambassador and Consul went to New Zealand; and then commenced a two-act farce, the first part of which related to the Treaty of Waitangi, and the second as to the proceedings of the chiefs of the Middle Island. Compare the document authenticated by Colonel Wakefield, as coming from the chiefs round Wellington, with that which constituted these New Zealanders an independent nation. Government said they would not pay attention to the last; it was a fraud—they would have nothing to do with it. Now, he maintained it was the second which contained the fraud. It was a fraud, not on the simple natives alone, but on the civilized world. You forfeited the right of original discovery, and acknowledged the sovereignty of this people. By the Treaty of Waitangi you pretend, in the face of civilized Europe, that you are bound. Where were your faith and honour when it was made? Never was anything more disgraceful than the proceedings with the savages. One witness said, a quantity of feofment was carried out, in order that the natives might sign it. Why, they'd sign anything for some tobacco and rum! He now came to the missionaries—the parties chiefly employed in carrying this Treaty of Waitangi. He must here, at the outset, remark, that this country, it must be confessed, was very much under the influence of cant. There was nothing on which it was more susceptible than as to the fate of the "aborigines." A formidable organization having been got up for the purpose of emancipating the blacks, when the freedom of the slave was proclaimed, the power and influence of this great body of sympathizers was all abroad; and it was gravely discussed to what subject public attention should next be directed—whether it should be home or colonial. When a member adopted a hobby, the custom was to refer it to a Committee; for by that means the Government god rid of the subject for at least some months. The way that the House thus dealt with a question was mischievous, and he believed it was so in this case. The noble Member for Dorsetshire loved hobbies very much; and he constantly had questions to refer to Select Committees, and he had now two remarkably long Bills before the House. Formerly, he had a number of measures respecting labour; and he had now taken up a new subject. He must observe, with respect to these measures, that although he entertained a very great respect for the noble Lord, yet it could not escape his observation that there were persons who lived by means of such hobbies. Now, what was the effect of the hobby with respect to the aborigines in New Zealand? Lord Normanby having found a Report of a Committee of the House of Commons, in which allusion was made to the aborigines, and on reading, exclaimed, "Oh, we can never stand against this; we must do something, so that the storm blow over;"—he, therefore, thought that the best mode of proceeding was, to get back the sovereignty of New Zealand; and so, for the purpose of maintaining good order, he again took possession of New Zealand. There were parties, also, who benefited by the hobby of the Waitangi Treaty. There were the missionaries, who largely profited by it. They took abroad with them a knowledge of the true faith, which they were to communicate to the aborigines of New Zealand, and they pretended to put it into the language of New Zealand. For this purpose they were obliged to coin a vast number of words; and why was this? Because the ideas of such a nation did not embody one-hundredth part of those which were to be found in the Sacred Volume. They had, therefore, translated it into a jargon, which he could read because he understood English; but he was certain there was not a native who could make anything of it. But these persons, whilst they exhibited so much piety, also took care to look to their own interests. One of the witnesses who was examined before the Committee had stated that one of the missionaries had acquired a bit of land; it occurred to him to ask the size of it, and the reply to his question was, that this bit was about 90,000 acres. There was another gentleman missionary who kindly took possession of a piece of land which had been a source of dispute between two chiefs. He interfered, and treated them as mere boys, and took possession of the object in dispute; and thus he got possession of 100,000 acres in the best part of the island. The question then arose, what was the cause of Auckland having been made the capital of the Colony? It was in consequence of missionary influence. It was this influence that unhappily governed the Colonial Office. The Colonial Minister was not the Minister of the Colonies in reality; there was a paramount authority behind which controlled him. A person holding the office of Colonial Secretary was made to believe that he was a great man by the authority he alluded to, until he attempted to govern without it, and he would do so if he were a man of large capacity and determined will; but Lord Stanley was not one of that class. He would get rid of the whole system. The truth was, that the Colonial Minister was governed by Mr. Stephens, and Mr. Stephens was governed by missionary influence. This was the case wherever they went to in the Colonies. They had a dispute with France respecting Tahiti, which nearly led to a rupture between the two countries; and this was all occasioned by the missionaries. The fact was, that these missionaries did no good but to themselves. From the time they had taken possession of the island till the present time, where had the outbreaks taken place? Always within the territories where these missionaries were. These men went out to preach the gospel of peace, but wherever they appeared an outbreak of violence took place. Recently the shape of the Government had been unpalatable to the missionaries, and the result was the proceedings at the Bay of Islands. If he was asked to put his finger on any persons who had done mischief in the transactions respecting New Zealand, he should first name the persons who drew up the Act of Parliament, and then Lord Normanby for his Treaty of Waitangi. The noble Lord the Member for the city of London was obliged to give way on this point, and so it would be with Lord Stanley. He did not, however, complain of any man in particular—it was not the men but the system which he complained of. A Colony should not be merely under the authority of a Governor acting on instructions from this country, but it should be constituted under a charter, acknowledging and declaring that the government of it vested in the people. Unless they acknowledged this principle, they must expect constant disputes and turmoil wherever they attempted to colonize. If they would allow the people of Wellington to govern themselves as the people of Rhode Island did, they would have had none of these differences, and the House would not have been troubled at such length respecting these disputes. Before the first large party of emigrants left the river Thames on their voyage out, they entered into a voluntary engagement as to the adoption of a form of government which they would adopt on their arrival at their destination. They had a precedent for this, the adoption of which was regarded with as much respect in the Northern States of America, as Magna Charta was in this country. If any one named the pilgrim fathers in that part of the United States, he would be told they were the persons most worthy of the respect of mankind. When, therefore, there was such an example before them, why should the adoption of the proceeding be visited with reprobation? At the same time he blamed the Company on other grounds, as he thought then, as he had thought at the time, that it was a hasty and, therefore, unwise proceeding to send out such a large body of emigrants before they had cleared their ground, and made proper preparation for their reception. Now, if the Government of the present day would calmly take up the Treaty of Waitangi, and examine it, and look into all the circumstances connected with it, and which led to its completion—he was convinced that, if they would impartially consider it, they would say that it was not worth the paper on which it was written. The Secretary of the Colonies talked of a land tax. Take any particular spot, he would defy them to tell who was the owner of it. The tribes were constantly wandering from place to place—they were here to-day, and there to-morrow, and there was, to use a legal expression, no assignable individual to be found as resident or proprietor. The tribes of Indians in America were in some respect like the savages in New Zealand; but they really occupied the land, for they hunted on it. It had been proved over and over again before the Committee that the natives of New Zealand only occupied small pieces of land, and they were only owners of it as long as they cultivated it, but no longer. The land was soon worn out by their mode of cultivation, and they then resorted to a new piece of fertile land, which they kept till the soil was exhausted, and no longer. They had no notion of boundaries, and they could not trace the land they claimed from river to river, or from mountain to mountain, in New Zealand, as this country could in India or elsewhere, or as the hon. Gentleman could trace out his patrimonial acres. It, therefore, was a monstrous piece of absurdity to talk of the land belonging to such or such a tribe. The noble Lord had said that he would respect the law of New Zealand; but did the noble Lord know what he meant by the expression? There certainly existed traditions of a certain kind amongst these natives, but there never existed any traditions respecting the ownership of land. He would challenge any one to show or prove that there was any law of the description respecting land. There might be a club, or something of that kind, which a son might inherit from his father, who had used it to knock down his enemies, but there was not a shadow of a shade of any law respecting the inheritance of land. He recollected, that a noble Lord, whose loss in that House no one could regret on the present occasion more than he did, had referred, in the last debate on this subject, to a title which a native put forward to some land, from the circumstance of his having killed and eaten the native chief who formerly resided near the spot. It came out in evidence that one tribe had conquered and exterminated another tribe, and had taken possession of the land of the latter; and as this was on the sea coast, they had turned to fishing for a subsistence, and did not cultivate the soil. So it constantly happened that one tribe was driven from a particular district by another tribe; but they never heard of any of these natives who could deal with or describe land acre by acre. One person, however, who was examined before the Committee, said, that land descended from generation to generation through its respective hues; and he drew such a picture of this description of the descent of land and its appanages, until he (Mr. Roebuck) almost thought that they were getting to the history of a German barony. But it was perfect nonsense to talk of any law respecting the descent of land amongst the natives of New Zealand. They would find that the savages of New Zealand were sagacious, brave, and a stout body of men; but they were very low in the scale of civilization. [Captain Rous: Hear!] He believed that he had seen as many savages as the hon. and gallant Officer had, and that he was also as well acquainted with their character. It happened that all the arms these savages now fought with were introduced by the missionaries. The natives did not know the use of metal. All the metal which they had was derived from us, although large quantities of ore were lying at their feet, almost in its native state. They had not arrived at that state that they knew how to forge iron, which was the first indispensable requisite to civilization. ["Hear, hear!"] He knew that the Mexicans did not forge iron, but they had other things which they used as a substitute for iron. It was an undoubted fact, that all uncivilized races of savages ultimately perished wherever civilized man came. They might look on this circumstance with regret; but the latter circumstance was uniformly fatal to the savage races. If the noble Lord would look to what had occurred with respect to the North American Indians, he would find how rapidly and constantly they had perished before the progress of civilization. All that they could do would be to guard against the perpetration of acts of cruelty towards the natives, and to take care that they did not do anything towards the natives, which would not be done towards one of the colonists or subjects of this country. Protect the natives as much as you possibly could; but still, whatever course was pursued, the same circumstance would arise as was invariable under similar circumstances—namely, that the brown men would entirely disappear. It was idle to talk of putting them in possession of the soil; but they were a class over whose welfare there might be some watch and guard. This could be done, not by the means proposed by the noble Lord, but by such a course as was adopted by the New Zealand Company, who allotted to them such portions of the country as they were able to cultivate. Something might be done in this way; but nothing could ever be done as long as the natives were treated as sovereigns of the soil, and land was purchased of them by large sums of money. He had seen something of this in North America. The House very unwisely granted 20,000*l.* a year to be distributed as presents among the native tribes of Indians in Canada. What was the result? They got drunk as soon as they received the money, and either continued so until they got rid of it, or in that state they were robbed of it; and the result was, that their number was gradually diminishing. So it would be in New Zealand. The House might depend upon it that acting upon the plan of the noble Lord the effect would be such as the introduction of the small-pox amongst them could only be an equivalent, and not half a dozen years would elapse before they were nearly all swept away. The noble Lord talked of the possessors of the soil, and of imposing a tax upon them. On this point he did not agree with his hon. and learned Friend as to the right of taxing savages. But how would the noble Lord set about levying this tax? He must first of all find out the owner of every particular spot, for they could not lay the tax on a tribe. They could not say that such or such a tribe should pay 1,000 dollars, but they must impose it on an individual. If this was the case, the whole thing was a mere pretence, for the natives had no means of paying the dollars. If the tax was imposed, the land would be forfeited every year. It was a paltry pretence, and, to use an expression of the noble Lord's, it was a thimble-rigging scheme. He therefore hoped that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would not listen to such a paltry pretence. It was, no doubt, the duty of the Government to consider the interests of the Maorie population. In doing so, let them look to justice being done them, but do not adopt a procedure which any individual in private life would be utterly ashamed to put forward. He trusted that the House would not be a party to such a monstrous proceeding. Difficult as the question might appear, they must be prepared to go straight forward; and, in the first place, they must consider the waste lands, as he believed they legally were, the property of the Crown, and treat them accordingly. They should provide, however, just as much land for the natives in each district as they could want for the purposes of cultivation, and take care to secure the possession of it to them. He did not suppose that the Government could persist in maintaining the strange conclusion of the noble Lord, that the possession of the waste lands should be considered to rest in the native chiefs. If the Government would at once rescind the proceedings of the noble Lord on this subject, they would relieve that House from a great deal of unnecessary trouble which must go on increasing as long as this system was persisted in.

The Attorney General said, it was not without a feeling of regret that, after the former discussion of three nights on this subect, he found that the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard had thought proper to renew it; and, above all, that it should be by a Motion of such a vague and indefinite character, from the adoption of which it was impossible to anticipate any beneficial result. On considering this question, he could not disguise from himself, that but for the existence of the New Zealand Company, and but for the interests of that Company, it never would have been brought forward. He trusted that he should be able to satisfy the House that it was not from any regard to the general prosperity of the Colony of New Zealand, that the hon. Member had called upon it to reconsider the subject; but entirely with a view to the interests of the New Zealand Company. He felt obliged to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bath, for having at once pointed out the policy which it was the object of the Motion to have adopted. It was, to compel the Government to abandon the Treaty of Waitangi, and to take possession of the whole of the unoccupied land in the Colony; and then, out of it, to make over a very large portion to the New Zealand Company. He agreed with many of the observations of one part of the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard, with respect to the establishment of the New Zealand Company. As for the original formers of this Company, he believed that many persons had joined it from the purest and the most disinterested motives. With respect to others, however, he believed that they were not insensible to the advantages which the adoption of such a scheme must produce; while others were only led to join it by the anticipation of the profit that would accrue from it as a commercial speculation. The Directors of the Company, in one of their early Reports, stated that the Colony was not established for political, but for commercial purposes; and from the large blue book it appeared that in a comparatively short time after its formation, it paid six per cent. interest on its capital. This circumstance offered a temptation to persons not influenced by disinterested motives to join it. He said this, because the Committee on the Report said that a great deal of the evil that had taken place in New Zealand had arisen from the New Zealand Company acting in defiance of the Governor. In the month of December, 1839, when the first purchase was made by Colonel Wakefield, a number of settlers had arrived, on the faith of the purchases of land having been completed. It therefore became necessary to find some place in which they might be located; they therefore made hasty and unfair purchases of the natives. As to the challenge of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bath as to the right of the natives or the New Zealand Company to the land, there could be no doubt that the independence of New Zealand had been recognised over and over again by this country. It was a question whether such recognition was politic or not, but the fact was indisputable. The hon. and learned Member for Bath said, that if New Zealand was an independent State, the New Zealand Company had a right to deal with them, and purchase land from the natives, and that such contract was valid; and he asked, how could they get out of this difficulty? His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bath was the first who suggested this ingenious argument; for the New Zealand Company had never argued that they could carry on such dealings with the natives of New Zealand without the sanction of the Government of this country. In May, 1839, an application was made by Mr.

Hutt to Lord Normanby, stating that a Colonization Company, as it was then called, had been formed, and was going out to New Zealand to purchase land. Why did the Company apply to Lord Normanby at all, if they were going out to New Zealand as to an independent country, to deal with an independent State? Lord Normanby's reply was, that he could not recognise them on the independent footing suggested, nor sanction the validity of any purchases they might make on that principle. The Company, on this refusal, broke up; and a day or two after this communication with the Government, the New Zealand Company issued a prospectus, dated May 2, 1839, at a time when they had not acquired one foot of land in the island—setting forth that they had made most extensive and advantageous purchases of territory, in convenient parts of the island, for the purposes of settlement. Again the Company applied to Lord Normanby, and again they were told that he would not recognise them on the footing required, nor sanction the validity of any purchases they might make. In defiance of this refusal, however, the Company sent out their officers with the settlers; and in the months of September, October, and November, of that year, Colonel Wakefield, their agent, made purchases extending over several degrees of latitude, upon deeds which, at all events, were not more intelligible to the natives than was the Treaty of Waitangi. The independence of New Zealand had for a number of years previously been recognised by the Government; but the proceedings of the New Zealand Company compelled the Government to take steps for the cession of the sovereignty of the island, for the purpose of protecting the natives. Instructions to this effect were sent out to Captain Hobson, who issued a proclamation accordingly in February, 1840. Did the Company then say that they had been treating with an independent State, that the Government had no right to interfere with their purchases, and that they protested against the proclamation, as far as they were concerned, up to that time? No. Or, did the noble Lord opposite, then in office, concur with them in the representations they now insisted upon, as to the utterly savage character of the natives? On the contrary, the noble Lord described them as tribes considerably removed from mere barbarism, as a nation with advanced ideas of cultivation, and impressed with established notions as to the rights of property and the division of the soil, and whose independence had been formally recognised by the British Government. If the New Zealanders answered to this description, it could not be deemed absurd, improper, or unjust, to enter into a Treaty with them. And having made that Treaty with them, on what principle was the Government of this country to attend to the demand of hon. Gentlemen opposite, that the Treaty should be set aside, and the honour of Great Britain violated? That, indeed, would be improper and unjust; and, had Government entered upon so dishonourable a course, the violence and massacres on the part of the natives, which all must so deeply deplore, would not have been without some justification. When the Treaty of February, 1840, became known, what said the New Zealand Company? They said this:—

"On mature reflection, your directors know no other remedy for the evils they have set forth, than for the Government to take on itself the duty of occupying all the lands as sole possessors, making compensation to such persons as have bonâ fide acquired property therein."

He had intimated, that he thought the late Government right in the policy they had pursued in this matter. What, then, was the Government to do, which, on coming into office, found the Treaty of Waitangi established? Surely, not to set aside that Treaty, to violate the pledged honour of the country, and, seizing on the wild lands, transfer them absolutely to the New Zealand Company. Nor, was the Treaty the sole guide which the new Government had to direct their course by. In November, 1840, Lord John Russell had made an agreement with the Company, having reference to all the existing circumstances of the case, in the Eleventh Article of which Agreement the Company distinctly and unequivocally—

"Forego and disclaim all title, or pretence of title, to any land in New Zealand, except such as may be granted to them by the Crown, preserving to the tribes and chiefs all the lands which they might individually or collectively possess."

This Article the Company, indeed, afterwards attempted to assume, was conditional; but it was a perfectly clear and unequivocal surrender of any claims they might have set up to any land, but such as the Crown might thereafter grant to them. And the Company had this great advantage in the matter over individual settlers, that whereas allotments to the latter were limited in quantity, the Company were to receive from Government grants commensurate in extent with the amount of their expenditure, at the very liberal ratio of four acres for every pound of money they could show, to the satisfaction of Mr. Penington, the Government Land Commissioner, they had laid out in the legitimate purposes of colonization. The letter of their own agent, dated the 24th August, 1841, and their reply to it, showed that they were sensible of the justice of this interpretation of the agreement. The Company complained that Lord Stanley had dealt harshly with them; whereas, in point of fact, he had dealt most liberally, even promising them that they should not be called upon to prove the validity of their titles, but that he would give them a primâ facie title to the full quantity of land awarded them, and put them in possession of it, unless where some prior title was established. True, the agreement was not carried out by Captain Fitzroy according to the intentions of Lord Stanley, but the noble Lord should not be assailed for this. Hon. Gentlemen opposite demanded a change of policy; he did not see how Government could pursue any other policy, than to respect the Treaty of Waitangi, and adhere, in the liberal spirit of construction it had manifested to the agreement made with the Company.

Mr. Labouchere had intended to give a silent vote on this occasion; but after what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Bath with reference to the conduct of Lord Normanby, under whom he had the honour to act in the Colonial Office, he should consider himself as shrinking from his duty to the House, to the noble Lord, and to himself, if he were not to make some observations on what the hon. and learned Member had advanced. But first he wished to say a few words as to what had been put forward by the hon. and learned Gentleman who last addressed the House; that hon. and learned Gentleman expressed the opinion that the question before the House was merely a question between the New Zealand Company and the Colonial Office: the hon. and learned Gentleman was quite mistaken. There was a much more important question than that submitted to their decision on this occasion; a question whether the Colony of New Zealand was not in that condition in which it had become the imperative duty of that House—not for the sake of the New Zealand Company merely, but for the sake of the people of this country—for the sake of a great, and what ought to be a most flourishing Colony, and for the sake of the large numbers of our countrymen who resorted there, to interpose for the purpose of inducing the Government to withdraw from the policy it had so mischievously acted upon, and which, at present, it evinced a determination of adhering to. His opinion was, that the sentiments of Her Majesty's Government, as indicated by the documents on the Table of the House, and expressed, so far as he had heard in that House, were unsatisfactory; and that it was, therefore, the duty of the House, when they heard the opinions of large and important parties expressed with respect to the condition of affairs of that Colony, to take into consideration the policy which it was right to pursue with respect to it. The hon. and learned Member for Bath, in remarking with respect to the policy which had been adopted by Lord Normanby, seemed to think that it had been founded on an over sensitive regard to the feelings of the aborigines; but he recollected all the circumstances connected with the policy of the Marquess of Normanby towards New Zealand—he recollected the period when Captain Hobson received those instructions—and he was well aware that Lord Normanby's desire was, that the Colony of New Zealand should present an exception to what had been almost the general rule previously in our Colonial history, namely, that the inferior should not be crushed or destroyed by the superior race; and that was, he could assure the House, an important element of all the policy of that nobleman. If those instructions which Lord Normanby then gave, and the policy which he adopted, had been fairly carried out and acted upon by Her Majesty's present Ministers, that state of things which had since been presented in New Zealand would never have occurred; and it was not fair, therefore, to infer, that because Lord Normanby had given those instructions to Captain Hobson, all that had since taken place in New Zealand was the result of them, although his policy had not been carried out in that Colony. Those were his opinions; but he did not rest them upon his own view solely, for he was fully borne out in them by the opinion of the Select Committee which inquired into the subject, which was composed of many individuals who usually voted with the Government, and the opinion of which could not be supposed to be swayed by prejudice. What did that Committee say on the subject of the Treaty of Waitangi? It said—and he would remark that it was not the Treaty of Waitangi, but the interpretation put by the Government upon it, which caused the evil that had been complained of—it said that the acknowledgment in the local authorities of the right of property on the part of the natives in land, after the right had been assumed by the Crown, was not essential to the Treaty of Waitangi, and was injurious in its consequences. He (Mr. Labouchere) conceived that many misfortunes had resulted from that interpretation which the Government had given to the Treaty of Waitangi; and he regretted to see, that after the publication of that opinion of the Committee, they (the Government) still adhered to the interpretation which was so condemned by the Committee, and to a course of policy founded on that interpretation. Lord Stanley continued to adopt that interpretation, and that course of policy, after the publication of the Report of the Committee, which expressed their opinion of the injurious consequences which had arisen from it. He (Mr. Labouchere) did not consider this a question between the Government and the New Zealand Company; nor did he rise as the defender of all the actions of the New Zealand Company, although it was his opinion that the New Zealand Company and the missionaries might have been rendered very useful and beneficial in the advancement of the prosperity of the Colony, by the adoption of a wise policy on the part of the Government. He did not wish to see the Government at home in subjection to either; but he wished to see a course of policy which would render both useful in assisting the carrying out of a wise and well-considered course of proceeding in that Colony. He did not agree with the hon. and learned Member for Bath in thinking that the Treaty of Waitangi was waste paper. Far from it; for although it was not entered into with a people who were in a state of civilization, yet it was agreed to by this country, and it ought to be adhered to as perfectly as if it were with France or America, or any other country. But then it ought to be on fair conditions; for it would be mere nonsense to apply to half-civilized savages, like the New Zealanders, those rules of property which could only apply to a country in a condition similar to that in which England is placed. Let substantial justice be observed towards New Zealand—that only was required: if they had looked to substantial justice in the interpretation of the Treaty, the evils which had since been so much complained of would have disappeared long ere this time. Nothing could possibly be more absurd than to suppose, that a population of 100,000 natives, who were not hunters, and did not require large districts for their support, like the North American Indians—nothing could be more absurd than to suppose that this population, so constituted, had a right of property over 80,000,000 of acres, to the exclusion of the Government of this country, or of the colonists who went out to New Zealand. It was so directly opposed to sound policy, and a wise course of Government, that it would only lead to those disasters which had taken place in New Zealand. A state of things which had long continued had been going on from bad to worse, until acts of a most appalling description had at length occurred. A British settlement had been taken and ransacked; and the House had a right to hear from the Government a distinct and satisfactory account of the course which it intended to pursue. If the House looked to the assurances which they had, they would be found to be anything but satisfactory; for there was no answer to be found, except that a great body of troops would be sent to New Zealand; and he (Mr. Labouchere) would say, that if that was all, New Zealand promised to be a very unprofitable appendage to us for a few years to come. There would, if that were the only policy to be adopted, be a very great sacrifice of money and of men for a long period; and New Zealand, instead of being a valuable adjunct to the commercial greatness of this country, would only present, for many years, a scene of disaster. He agreed with the opinions of several Gentlemen at that side of the House, as to the notable expedient of the Government, namely, the imposition of a land tax for all the waste lands. They treated the aborigines as if they were the most civilized country in the world, in this particular. They recognised their rights to property in as complete a manner as it could be recognised in England in the nineteenth century, and they followed up that course by the plan of proposing a land tax—another mistake, which every one who knew anything of such wild countries, knew was only calculated to lead to mischief and confusion. He (Mr. Labouchere) merely rose to do an act of justice to a nobleman who deserved the highest merit for his policy towards New Zealand; but before he sat down, he felt it his duty to allude to another Gentleman connected with the Colonial Office, and whom the hon. and learned Member for Bath thought fit to attack—a gentleman whose name he (Mr. Labouchere) could not pass over, if not in justice to him, in justice to his own feelings—he alluded to Mr. Stephen. He (Mr. Labouchere) brought away from that Office, as others had also done, a deep and enduring respect for the virtues, and abilities, and great services of Mr. Stephen. He knew it was too much the habit to attribute everything which was displeasing in the conduct of the business of the Colonial Office to Mr. Stephen; and so much was this the custom, that one day Mr. Stephen said to him (Mr. Labouchere), so constant was the desire to attribute everything of an evil tendency to him, that it would be better he (Mr. Stephen) left the Office altogether; but he (Mr. Labouchere) replied that it was a great advantage in that case to have him there, and he requested him not to leave, as all that the principals did would be attributed to Mr. Stephen. No mistake was greater than to suppose that Mr. Stephen was anxious to engross power at the Colonial Office; but his services and experience were so great, that he never knew any one at that Office who was not desirous of having the assistance of so acute a mind as that of Mr. Stephen; nor had he ever seen any one more desirous of putting fairly and clearly the facts and means of judgment before the eyes of his principal, leaving him to decide for himself, unbiassed by any prejudices he (Mr. Stephen) might have. He felt that that acknowledgment was due to one to whom he was under great obligation; and it would be no disparagement to any other person in that Office to say that the most distinguished for talents and services was the Gentleman whose name he had just mentioned. He should, then, give his vote in favour of the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend; for he did not think the Ministers had given any assurance to the House with which they ought to be satisfied, in the present grave and critical state of affairs in New Zealand. He was afraid that they felt ashamed of retracing their steps, which every day was leading to worse results; and he was sure, that if the House, in a case like this, refused to interpose—if they were so taken up by party attachment, and party conflicts in that House, that such an appeal as was made that evening on behalf of this Colony should be neglected, it would go far to shake that confidence and respect with which he desired to see all Colonies look to that House, as their protectors against all evils that might befall them.

Sir R. H. Inglis said he was anxious to recall the attention of the House to the observations which had been made to-night with reference to the missionaries in New Zealand. The animus exhibited by the New Zealand Company was anything but favourable to the missionaries. That might have been collected from the tone of the hon. and learned Member for Cockermouth (Mr. Aglionby), when on a former occasion he requested the House to observe that the late rebellion took place in a portion of the island especially under the cognizance and instruction of the missionaries. And the hon. and learned Member for Bath (Mr. Roebuck), in that part of the speech which referred to the recent unhappy disturbances told the House that this was the very quarter of the island which had for so many years enjoyed the benefits of missionary superintendence. The inference from those statements was clear, namely, that the disturbances which had occurred took place either through the direct misfeasance of the missionaries, or by their absolute neglect. In answer to that, he would ask the hon. Members to recollect the state in which New Zealand was before the missionaries arrived in that country. He would ask, could such a war as that which recently disturbed the northern part of that island, have taken place in former days without the occurrence of barbarities too dreadful for utterance in that House? He would ask, had not the chief Heki exhibited a degree of chivalry and gallantry which would have been an honour to any European nation, and, as the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard had said, would have honoured one European nation, which claims for itself to be the most civilized in the world? If the House would contrast the conduct of the New Zealand chief Heki with that of Colonel Pelissier, he would ask, whether the influence of Christianity had not been manifested, if not by the white man in Africa, at least by the dark man in New Zealand? He would ask whether, in the attack on Kororarika, a native chieftain had not exhibited a courtesy and self-devotion which had not often been equalled since the days of Bayard, and which certainly had not been excelled? The hon. and learned Member for Liskeard could no longer look upon New Zealanders as children or savages; and as a further indication of the condition in which that people were, he (Sir R. Inglis) would remind the House that during the late disturbances there, a young woman and her child, who were taken by the New Zealanders—by those whom we in the self assumption of our pride call savages—was restored, unharmed, and without insult, by a flag of truce; and that two English officers, who were taken by the native chief, were sent back without having received any injury, and returned in such a manner as many other countries would not have returned them, namely, with their arms—their swords and pistols having been left with them. Let the House recollect what would have been the character of that war if it had taken place thirty years ago; and then he would ask, was not the influence of Christianity and of the exertions of the missionaries apparent? He would also refer with gratitude and satisfaction to the conduct of the Bishop of New Zealand, which had been spoken so highly of since his arrival in the Colony, but particularly during the later disturbances. Lieutenant Philpotts stated in one of his letters, that the conduct of the bishop in bringing off the women and children, and wounded, under a heavy fire, was deserving of the highest admiration; whilst his attendance on the wounded, performing the most menial offices for them, and administering both spiritual and temporal comfort to them, was equally praiseworthy. With respect to the conduct of the Government, he admitted they committed two faults—one in deputing the investigation into the state of New Zealand to a Committee of that House; and the next in appointing to the Government of that Colony an officer, who, if alive when the appointment reached him, might decline to accept it. Referring to the instructions given by Lord Stanley to Captain Grey, the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Buller) regarded them as being directly contrary to the promise alleged to have been given by the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Treasury, that there should be a representative government given to New Zealand, and, quoting the instructions sent out in pursuance, as they ought to have been, of that promise, the hon. and learned Gentleman had pointed out a discrepancy between the promise and the fulfilment of it. [Mr. C. Buller; Hear.] By that cheer the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to recognise his accuracy. But the hon. and learned Gentleman had in reading the despatch omitted one whole sentence. If the hon. Member read the whole of the despatch, he would find that there was no such discrepancy as the hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned, for it contained a statement that there were, at the time at which it was written, many objections to the plan, one of which was the condition of the natives. Did the hon. Member mean to say that he would include the natives of New Zealand in the representative Government? If so, the Europeans would be in a minority. Would he then exclude them from the plan? How, then, in that case, could they be considered as their fellow subjects under one system? The discrepancy to which the hon. Member alluded, between the conduct of Lord Stanley and the promise of his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government did not, in his opinion, exist. For his own part, he should give his confidence and support to the Government in this Motion, as he had so often given them on former similar occasions.

Mr. Aglionby deeply regretted to be called on to address the House on that occasion; but it was a subject of such importance that he could not avoid addressing some observations to the House, and in the course of his remarks he hoped he should not be induced, by any feeling he might entertain as to the treatment of the colonists, to use any expression of harshness, or calculated to excite irritation. He would not follow the hon. and learned Attorney General through all the documents to which he referred in his speech, as he thought that a Committee would be the most proper tribunal before which to lay those documents. He could not allow the misconceptions, and consequently the misrepresentations of the hon. and learned Attorney General to pass unnoticed, for that hon. Gentleman had misunderstood the proceedings and conduct of the New Zealand Company. The hon. and learned Gentleman was mistaken in the assertion that the Company went out without any land whatever. They had purchased land from private individuals, and from the native chiefs, who were qualified to sell it. There was no illegality in that. What right, therefore, had the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that the purchases were made unfairly? There was not a particle of correctness in what the hon. and learned Gentleman had said on the point. Nor were the purchases hastily made. In reference to this matter the public would find all the information bearing upon it in the letter of Mr. Wakefield. He detailed the manner in which the purchases had been made, and goods and money were fairly paid to the parties who sold the land. What right, then, had the Attorney General to say that the purchases were unfairly made? In no one instance had the Commissioners of Claims said that such had been the case. The Company had, he believed, paid about 7,900*l.* as an additional compensation, in one case, at Nelson, and all for the goodwill of the land. As to the emigrants, they went out with a full knowledge of all the facts connected with the Colony. The Company did not deceive them. Every particle of information which the Company had at its disposal was published to the world. The emigrants knew how and why they went out; nor had he yet heard any complaint made by them of the Company's proceedings. They complained of ruined hopes, of loss of property, and of the want of safety to their lives; but it was not of the Company they complained. In all its proceedings, the Company had ever preferred a pacific course, and in no one instance had it exhibited any feeling but a desire to obtain peace, at any sacrifice but that of loss of honour. They preferred taking an agreement (which was a compromise) to going to a court of law. The Company took the agreement, and were satisfied with it. Who dared to say that the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord John Russell) was misled by what were called the misrepresentations of the Company? Every document which they had at command, was then, as now, at the command of the Colonial Office. The noble Lord knew very well what he was about, and the Company were perfectly satisfied with his agreement. It was true, that when the Court of Claims was established, they did not assent. Colonel Wakefield said, that, in his belief, the agreement of the noble Lord rendered the Court of Claims inapplicable to the case. To settle the question, they had placed upwards of 7,000*l.* in the hands of their agent. The peace, the harmony, and the prosperity of the settlement was the main consideration with the Company. The Company certainly believed that they had the opportunity, in a pecuniary point of view, of receiving all that they could wish; and the body of the proprietors unanimously agreed to listen to no terms, to take no money, which might compromise the safety of the settlers. He ventured to assert that the safety of the colonists had been, was, and ever should be, the main object of the Company. Satisfy them that the colonists were safe, and they cared but little what was done with them. They besought Lord Stanley to settle other matters as he pleased, but to settle the land question at once, and in the way which we conceived to be alone the proper way. They took the agreement coupled with an express condition, that the grant should be made immediately. He would only say, that nothing had ever been concealed by the Company, and if the House wished for information nothing would be concealed. With respect to what the hon. Baronet the Member for Oxford (Sir R. Inglis) said as to his (Mr. Aglionby's) saying that the missionaries had entirely under their control that portion of the island which was now the seat of disturbance, he had put it in the shape of a question to the Under Secretary, and he could not deny it. It was urged by the hon. Baronet that this showed the animus which actuated the Company in regard to the missionaries. He (Mr. Aglionby) believed that Mr. Baring's Bill in that House had been thrown out by the influence of the Church Missionary Society. That Society was managed by Mr. Dandeson Coates. That gentleman asserted, on a subsequent day, that so long as he could oppose it, New Zealand should never be colonized by the Company. His opposition to the Company still continued, and it was a strong and powerful opposition. He had, at an early period of the Session, called the attention of the House to a fact, which he would now beg leave to state again. He had received a letter, or rather circular, and a similar circular had been received by many others; and when he stated its purport, he would ask whether the opposition manifested in it, did not justify him in saying, that the difficulties of the Company were greatly to be attributed to the opposition of Mr. Dandeson Coates? The hon. and learned Gentleman then read the circular, requesting the party to whom it was addressed to present it to the Member for Cockermouth, and to desire him to use his influence in order that the Members might oppose the recommendation of the Select Committee who had reported upon the state of New Zealand and the affairs of the Company. It was signed by John D. White. [Sir R. Inglis: It was not from Mr. Coates?] No. [Sir R. Inglis: Nor from the Church Missionary Society?] The hon. Baronet now wished to insinuate that he was grossly in error, and was grossly misleading the House, when he mentioned that document as a proof that Mr. Coates and the Church Missionary Society were still in opposition to the claims of the New Zealand Company? He would now ask the hon. Baronet who Mr. White was? He would ask him now—

Sir R. Inglis: Did the hon. and learned Gentleman wish him to interrupt him a second time? If so, he would give him an answer. If not, he would wait till the hon. and learned Gentlemen had done.

Mr. Aglionby would ask, for the information of the House, who Mr. White really was? He would likewise ask, in reference to Mr. Dandeson Coates, if the circular quoted had been sent forth without his knowledge or direction? The circular was written on the part of the Church Missionary Society. Did the hon. Baronet mean to disavow Mr. White's proceeding—did he mean to deny that Mr. Coates, either directly or indirectly, sent the letter? Did he mean to deny that the Church Missionary Society did not cause it to be sent? If so, let him at once inform the House of it. It was sent with the cognizance, or by the authority of Mr. Coates, or of the Church Missionary Society. In accordance with the Church Missionary Society, its missionaries in the Colony had a direct interest in obstructing colonization by any one but themselves. The missionaries might be divided into three classes:—First, there were those who went out from the most highminded, the purest, and the most benevolent of motives, and who thought that the introduction of any European society into the Colony would introduce with it European arts and luxuries, and with them European vices, and thus obstruct the christianizing and civilizing the natives of New Zealand; such men he could respect. There was another class, not quite so highminded, but who had not the base pecuniary interest which others had. They formed a considerable body of the missionaries, and were honest and intelligent mechanics, who went out to preach the doctrines of the Church Missionary Society. They reigned as little kings in their different districts, where their influence was paramount; and he could easily conceive the motives of their objection to colonization by any one but themselves. The third and the worst class were actuated solely by their wishes for their own selfish aggrandizement, who had set aside the instructions of the Society, and who had procured for themselves large and extensive grants of land. The Church Missionary Society were not, as a body, large holders of land, although they had about 11,000 acres. The missionaries to whom he now more immediately alluded, had obtained nearly 200,000 acres of land in New Zealand. These parties likewise had a direct personal interest, with Mr. George Clarke at their head, and Mr. George Clarke, jun.; they had a direct personal and pecuniary interest in the northern part of the island. He would now ask the Government whether, notwithstanding these missionaries, they would or would not colonize New Zealand? It was their duty now to carry forward colonization to the advantage of all parties and classes—natives and white persons. In addition to what he had thus advanced, he felt himself obliged to rise, to trouble the House upon a matter of private and personal honour, which had been confided to his charge, and which, if he did not bring before the House, he would feel himself guilty of a grievous dereliction of his duty; and the House would pardon him for trespassing longer on their attention, when they called to mind how deep an interest he took in the Colony, and in all those connected with it. What he was now about to bring before the House, was a matter of a more delicate and painful character than any to which he had as yet alluded. He had listened to the representations of the Under Secretary with some surprise and pain. He did not think, however, that he was personally called upon, by anything which had fallen from the Under Secretary, to make any remark; but a letter had been sent to him, in consequence of these remarks on the part of the Under Secretary; and as the matter deeply affected the character and the honour of a gentleman of high character, and formerly a Member of that House, he was quite sure the House would forgive him for calling their attention to the subject, and reading the letter. It was signed by George Frederick Young, one of the members of the deputation who waited on Lord Stanley about a fortnight ago, and was as follows:—

"I have just heard, with equal surprise and pain, the unqualified denial given by Mr. Hope, on the part of Lord Stanley, of the assertion made by the Directors of the New Zealand Company, that the fact of his Lordship having given instructions to Captain Grey to grant primâ facie titles to the lands claimed by the Company, was not communicated by him to the deputation with whom the recent conferences have been held. As his Lordship is represented by Mr. Hope as declaring on his honour that he did read those instructions to the deputation, it is, of course, impossible for me to contradict such an assertion; but I owe it to my colleagues and to myself equally unequivocally to declare that, having taken an active and attentive part in the proceedings, I never heard a syllable, or saw a letter, referring in any way to a grant of conditional titles, to which, as a member of the Court of Directors, I have ever been so decidedly opposed; that, had the principle been attempted to be revived in my hearing, I should have considered it the first of duties to have rejected it, and protested against it in the strongest manner. One thing at least is certain. I waited on Mr. Wood, at the Land and Emigration Office, by desire of Lord Stanley, an hour previous to the time fixed for the last interview of the deputation, and there received from Mr. Wood a paper, which he stated to me was a copy of the instructions to Captain Grey on the subject of the Company's land claims. That paper I communicated to my colleagues, and afterwards returned to Lord Stanley at the interview. It was the instructions of the 6th of July, and contained no reference whatever to those of the 27th of June. When the latter was transmitted to the Company, in supposed conformity with the promise given by Lord Stanley, I instantly pronounced them to be totally different; and in order to clear up the question, went on Thursday last to the Colonial Office, where I saw Mr. Hope, and told him that I had an impression, amounting to absolute conviction, that they were not the same, and only hesitated positively to affirm it from an unwillingness to admit the possibility of intentional substitution. And, in order to remove all doubt, I asked to see the original document, placed in my hands on the 4th of July, and returned to Lord Stanley. On its being brought, I immediately identified it; and it is not pretended that it contained any reference to the instructions of the 27th of June. Mr. Hope then said, that these latter papers 'had been sent in a hurry by mistake,' and permitted me to take with me the instructions of July 6, without the slightest intimation that he supposed I was acquainted with the others, which again I declare, upon my honour, I was not. I write in great haste, but hope my explanation will be intelligible. It is truly mortifying to me, after the especial pains I thought I had taken to avoid any repetition of former misunderstandings, to find myself placed almost in antagonism with Lord Stanley on a point of veracity. I have the most unhesitating confidence that his Lordship is utterly incapable of asserting intentionally an untruth. Those to whom I am known will, I am sure, do me equal justice; and I must, therefore, leave this unlucky discrepancy in our statements to be reconciled in any manner that Mr. Hope's declarations and this explanation may allow to be compatible with honour, which, on my part, I commit to your friendship, assured that you will not allow it to be in any quarter impeached."

He regretted that he was obliged to read such a letter to the House; but he must remark, that he was sure that when hon. Gentlemen saw that so doing was necessary to clear the honour and the character of any Gentleman whose honour and character were implicated by anything which fell from any hon. Gentleman in that House, they would admit that he had done right in introducing both the subject and the letter. He would only now say that Mr. Young made the same statement to them when the papers were transmitted to them, and he now repeated his full assurance that he never heard of the other document. He had no reason to doubt the perfect accuracy, so far as his recollection served him, of the Under Secretary. The despatch of the 26th of June was confined to two or three points; one, the settlement of the Company's claims to the land, the other points referring to the government of the Colony, whereas that of the 6th of July was confined solely and wholly to the claims to land. In the letter, enclosing the despatch of the 27th of June, it was stated that the deputation had that day an interview with Lord Stanley, and that his Lordship placed in the hands of the deputation the instructions issued to Captain Grey on the subject of the Company's claim to land. Having stated this much he would now resume his seat, without offering another remark.

Sir R. Inglis rose to explain, but the cries for a division were so loud and so general, that the hon. Baronet's explanation did not reach us.

Mr. G. W. Hope begged to be allowed to offer a very short explanation as to what had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman. As the House would perceive, if they looked at the Papers, there were extracts, and there was also a complete despatch. The complete despatch was placed in the hands of the deputation, and was taken away by the deputation. That was the document which Mr. Young had had in his hand. When application was made for the extracts, it was pointed out to him, in the minutes of the meeting, that his Lordship had placed in the hands of the meeting the instructions to Captain Grey. He (Mr. Hope) consequently directed the extracts only to be sent. Mr. Young alleged that they were not what he had possession of, to which he had answered that it certainly was not. There was no intention to deceive Mr. Young or anybody else.

Debate adjourned.

SLAVE TRADE (BRAZILS).] On the Motion for going into Committee on the Slave Trade (Brazils) Bill,

Mr. M. Gibson, looking at the Bill as a penal act against the Brazilians, thought it of importance that all the correspondence relating to it should be laid on the Table of the House, and with this view moved its committal on a future day, in order to give the Government an opportunity of producing the correspondence.

Sir R. Peel said, that any delay in passing the Bill through its stages would be most prejudicial to the public service. The main part of the correspondence alluded to was in the Slave Trade Papers. He would postpone the third reading of the Bill, if the House would consent to the Committee being taken, so as to give time to look into the correspondence.

Mr. Milner Gibson said, he should not be performing his duty if he allowed the Bill to proceed, and moved that the Committee be postponed till Friday.

Sir R. Peel then proposed that the Bill now be committed pro formâ, so that the Amendments be printed, the right hon. Baronet undertaking to move that it should be recommitted on Thursday. He had doubts as to the propriety of producing the notice given by the Brazilian Government of the termination of the Convention, and all the correspondence upon the subject; but he would make inquiry, and if, upon consideration, he found that the Papers could not be produced, the debate could be taken on some day subsequent to Thursday.

Bill went through Committee pro formâ.

JEWISH DISABILITIES.] Sir R. Peel moved that the Jewish Disabilities Bill be read a third time.

Sir Robert Inglis protested against the Bill as inconsistent with the Christian character of the Constitution, and moved that it be read a third time that day three months.

Colonel Sibthorp entirely agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford, whom he regarded as a true Christian and Protestant. He would always be happy to record his vote with his hon. Friend against any measure introduced by the right hon. Baronet; and there was no measure which he did not believe the right hon. Baronet, as a Minister, capable of introducing for the spoliation and ruin of the Protestant Church.

The House divided on the Question, that the word "now" stand part of the Question:—Ayes 44; Noes 11: Majority 33.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. From General Assembly of Free Church of Scotland, and from Haddington, and several other places, in favour of the Universities (Scotland) Bill.—From Presbytery or Synod of Munster, in favour of the Colleges (Ireland) Bill.

SCOTTISH UNIVERSITIES.] The Marquess of Breadalbane presented several petitions from places in Scotland, praying for the abolition of all religious tests in the Scottish Universities. One of the petitions was from the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, which embodied several resolutions in which the exclusion of all religious tests was not advocated, but in which the petitioners expressed themselves strongly against the exclusive system now sought to be revived by the members of the Established Church in that country. He begged, in presenting these petitions, to express his sincere regret, that the measure which had been brought forward in the other House of Parliament for remedying this grievance, had been lost by the opposition of Her Majesty's Government; though they had originally expressed themselves favourable to it. The Scotch Colleges would now afford education to but a comparatively small portion of the population; whereas, if the Bill to which he had alluded had passed, they would be able to afford the most important benefits to the people generally. In his opinion, the speech of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley), in introducing the Irish Colleges Bill, was the very best introduction that could have been made to a measure for Scotland.

Lord Stanley denied that the Government had acted inconsistently with regard to Ireland and Scotland. They required no new test in the latter country; and they expressed their determination to maintain the existing test in the case of the University of Dublin. He must, however, decline entering into the discussion of a measure which had been rejected in the other House of Parliament, and which had not come under their Lordships' consideration.

Lord Campbell repudiated the idea of reviving a law that had been allowed to lie dormant for more than a century; and under which his esteemed friend Sir David Brewster—a man whose reputation was European—was in danger of being turned out of his office.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE—IRISH GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.] Lord Brougham said, he had a question of privilege on which to claim their Lordships' attention, which, of course, had precedence of all others, including that which his noble Friend had just brought under their notice. It was known to their Lordships, that he was one of those—forming, he feared, a minority in their Lordships' House—who entirely disapproved — who on principle disapproved—of all violent and forcible exercise of what were called the privileges—but what he would call rather the powers than the privileges—of Parliament; and that, consequently, he confined his objections to the exercise of those privileges, to certain cases where they were not used in the nature of remedies, or removal of obstructions; but that he, at the same time, constantly—and so did many noble Lords, noble Friends of his, who agreed with him—entirely approved, as of necessity they must approve, of the existence and exercise of privilege, where it was confined to removing obstructions to their Lordships' proceedings. Whether the case which he was about to bring before their Lordships fell within that description or not, he would not say; but after the course which had been recently taken within the present Session, and only a few days ago, he felt it to be his bounden duty, that he should, even if he were not the person individually concerned in this breach of privilege, bring it under their Lordships' attention. It was necessary to state, before he read to the House a statement which had been published in a newspaper, that they took notice elsewhere, as he was informed by common report, not only of what passed in their Lordships' House, but even in their Select and Secret Committees, designating the very persons who had spoken, and commenting on the speeches made. He did not choose to retaliate by taking any notice whatever of what passed in the other House, unless he happened to see it reported in the Votes. But when he perceived this publication, he could not remain silent respecting it. So gross a fabrication, and so scandalous a libel on the other House of Parliament—not only on a Member of the House, but on the House itself as a body—could not well be imagined. He knew that the other House could protect itself, and defend its own privileges, and that without any interference on the part of their Lordships; but still the subject was one, he was prepared to show, worthy of their Lordships' notice. Some weeks ago, he was informed by the Votes of the other House that a Railway Bill having been reported against by the Standing Orders Committee, for almost innumerable breaches of the Standing Orders, that Report was received by the House; and then a Member of the House, as he perceived also by the Votes, of the name of Mr. Fitzstephen French, came down, and made a Motion to rescind the Resolution, and to allow the Bill to proceed. He was reminded by his noble Friend near him (Lord Monteagle), that the name of the hon. Member was not mentioned in the Votes; but, at all events, a Member made a Motion to rescind the decision of the Committee, in consequence of the narrow majority by which it had been obtained; he had, however, reason to know, and that from matters which occurred out of the House, who the hon. Member was. He took notice of what he had seen on the Votes of the other House in his place in Parliament, in order to give the parties concerned what he thought was a humane, and considerate, and generous warning, in order that they might not be throwing away their money in support of the Bill; because if, as was not improbable, it would be found that the Standing Orders of their Lordships' House, as well as those of the other House of Parliament, had been violated, no majority of their Lordships would be found to rescind the vote of their Committee. After that announcement, he was waited upon by Mr. Fitzstephen French; and that fact, though not recorded in the Votes, he knew of his own knowledge. He, or a person calling himself Mr. Fitzstephen French—for he had not the honour of knowing the Gentleman previously—waited upon him (Lord Brougham) on the subject. He would say nothing of the unduly complimentary terms which the Gentleman applied to him; of the great power and weight which he possessed; and of the somewhat exaggerated, and almost fanciful terms in which he described the power which he (Lord Brougham) was likely to have in this matter. He gave Mr. Fitzstephen French credit, as he did now, for being exceedingly anxious on the matter; he had no doubt whatever but that it was from a purely generous and public principle, that he took so great an interest in the Dublin and Galway Railway; and that if he was the Member who had given the Notice to induce the House of Commons to rescind the vote of their Committee, he did so from a highminded feeling—that, in fact, he had no more concern in the project as a director or shareholder, than he (Lord Brougham) had; but that he thought on the matter as he believed it to be his duty as a good Irishman to do. He had been willing to give him (Mr. F. French) credit for these patriotic feelings; but he had since discovered that this person was actually one of the directors of the Dublin and Galway Railway Board; and he also found out, in the course of the inquiry that had been delegated to him, that all these directors took shares as a qualification for their office. He had found, too, that almost all the directors took, besides the twenty shares which it was necessary for them to hold as a qualification, five hundred shares each over and above, that they might be more certain of having an interest in its success. But he had likewise discovered that the invariable rule followed by almost all these directors was, the very moment they got these five hundred shares, to keep just twenty of them, necessary for their qualification, and to sell the others. In that way, it appeared that one gallant officer, a gallant general, made no less than 700*l.* or 800*l.*, as well as, of course, at the same time, gratifying his patriotic feelings towards Ireland; and that these directors were thus sellers of their shares, and that they profited thereby. He did not blame them; but they had seen lately two gentlemen most severely visited for interfering in railway shares, as if they were the only persons who had ever done anything of the kind; whereas it was upon the evidence of the very Committee by which they were condemned, that others without number had done the very same thing, without being condemned; and, in fact, all that had been done by those who were so complained of was, that they received shares as a compliment, after the thing was over; nor did it appear, that their vote or interest was ever affected in the slightest degree by any previous bargain. He stepped aside willingly to do this act of justice to individuals who had been oppressed by a Pharisaical purity, which had lately been got up on the subject of railways, and which, before the Session was over, would be found to be misplaced. It was more agreeable to him to do justice to them than to himself on the present occasion. He drew a distinction, however, between them and those persons who made Motions to get majorities in favour of certain Bills, and who voted themselves, as if influenced by patriotic principles, while they were at the very time shareholders in the projects which they supported. If Mr. Bonham and Captain Boldero had done that, he should regard their conduct in a very different light from that in which he now viewed it. However, when this gentleman, Mr. Fitzstephen French, applied to him, he threw himself on his protection. He (Mr. F. French) called it mercy; for he said, that if they were great and powerful, he hoped they would also be merciful. He added that he adopted the course which he had taken, in consequence of the absence of his noble Friend then behind him (the Marquess of Clanricarde), thereby meaning to insinuate that the noble Marquess was as fond of the Bill as he was himself; and that if he had been present, he would have been a party to the application. He had never seen this individual before, and he had scarcely met him since. His answer to him was, that he should wait till he saw the Bill; and that the parties would find it difficult to get over the Standing Orders; and that their Lordships allowed no canvassing on Private Bills; that he could have no communication with him except what was official and public; but that he should be happy to receive any useful suggestion to guide him. Their Lordships would recollect that a noble Friend of his had presented a petition from a gentleman and banker of the name of Pym, which complained that the share list of this Company had been made out by inventing names, and signing falsely signatures for others, who had given no authority for doing so, and that thus the Standing Orders of their Lordships' House had not been complied with. So great a fraud, alleged to have been practised by any parties in their Lordships' House, led to an immediate appointment of a Committee to inquire into the matter. He had the honour of being one of that Committee; and in his capacity of a Member of the Committee he had had communication with two individuals. One of these was Mr. Smith, who was parliamentary agent for the petition, and against the Bill; and the other was a Mr. Croucher, of whom he knew nothing, but who had given him a letter on the subject, which he had put in his pocket, and had never read to this hour. The other papers he had received he had handed to the Chairman of the Committee (the Earl of Besborough). They were, under the Orders of the House, to receive this information; they could not choose but receive it, and they acted upon it. They then sent for Mr. Smith and Mr. Croucher, and desired them to point out the names which had been forged, fabricated, or signed by the persons nominating. He pointed out some eight or ten cases, into every one of which the Committee minutely inquired. In the course of this inquiry the name of Fitzstephen French occurred, and the very question at which he took such grievous offence was not put by the Committee themselves, but read from a paper of Mr. Pym, whose charges against the railway shareholders and brokers the Committee were commanded to inquire into. He (Lord Brougham) was about to read that which appeared in a morning paper of that day, The Times, and which he should presently state his reasons for believing to be a gross fabrication. It purported to be the report of a debate in the other House of Parliament—pretended to be, but he should say falsely; and he would presently show why he called it false, not merely technically, but substantially:—

"Mr. French considered that the House was perfectly correct in watching with a jealous eye the conduct of those to whom it delegated its authority. He would state this generally, as it appeared to him that it should not be limited in its application to parties only who had been mixed up in pecuniary transactions. There were other still greater delinquencies than any that had been alluded to that evening. Could the House for a moment conceive the person who had been selected, in this or the other House of Parliament, as a judge, placing himself in secret communication with the agent of one of the parties—receiving and acting upon information he acquired in this manner from the individual who had been selected to get up the opposition to the case he had been appointed to try—browbeating every witness brought up by those who were defending themselves—having the indecency, in a railroad case, to demand whether their shares were at a premium? and, being answered in the affirmative, declaring he would 'take care to have them at a discount;' and, ultimately, suppressing the evidence which disproved the case he was anxious to establish? Would not the case be worse if this individual had once occupied a high legal station? Perhaps you will tell me that conduct such as this can only be accounted for by the individual being fitter for being placed as an inmate in a large establishment at the other side of the water, than for occupying a seat in either House of Parliament. Conceive a Company placing before him every document in their possession, in reference to the case—the minute-book of all their proceedings—their bankers' accounts, showing all their money transactions, and into which the Company courted an investigation, tendering their Chairman for examination, whom he refused to call, but behind his back basely attempted to calumniate, asking, 'Had he ever been a candidate for a lucrative employment in a rival railway?' Possibly such a question should be regarded with contempt, as coming from one who had shown himself incapable of either thinking, acting, or speaking, as a gentleman; but as he (Mr. French) was the person about whom this question was put, and feeling that, was there the slightest foundation for this base and dastardly insinuation, he should be unworthy of a place amongst them, he had deemed it his duty to call their attention to the fact. The individual about whose conduct he had spoken (and he was prepared to establish every statement he had made) was Lord Brougham and Vaux, and the case the Dublin and Galway Railway."

He thought he might well ask their Lordships if ever they had seen, in the whole course of their lives, a more foul and libellous, and he was about to show it to be false—but had they ever seen a more foul and slanderous attack on any individual? And this attack was upon an individual not volunteering his services, but compelled by their Lordships, ordered to attend a Committee, and obliged, in the execution of that duty, to put questions, whether he would or no. The Committee were obliged to put the question alluded to, because Mr. Pym the petitioner had written it, and given it to the Committee, and it was from his handwriting that they had put it. In the whole course of the proceeding they had acted in every respect according to the strict rules of legal evidence known in all the courts of justice. Now, the first thing alleged was this, "Could the House for a moment conceive the person who had been selected in this or the other House of Parliament as a judge"—that was utterly untrue, it was an absolute and entire blunder and confusion of ideas. He was placed in an inquisitorial, not a judicial situation. They were a Committee appointed to inquire into and report the result of their inquiry, and their Lordships and the Committee on the Bill alone were the judges; but, it went on to say, "placing himself in secret communication with the agent of one of the parties, receiving and acting upon information he acquired in this manner." He refused all communication on the subject; he received letters which he did not read, and refused to speak to Mr. Smith or Mr. Croucher; but that was accidental, for he had a perfect right to speak to them. They did not want to get secret information behind people's backs—they only wanted to know what witnesses they were to call, and it was his business to examine into that. He never had the least secret communication with any human being whatever on the subject. "Browbeating every witness brought up by those who were defending themselves." That he sharply examined one or two witnesses was true, and if he had not so examined them the truth would have been concealed, delinquencies would not have been brought to light, and great culprits would have escaped. It was proved that the names of persons who never had been in existence were forged; that he sharply examined any one excepting the person from whom he obtained those facts, and one or two agents of the Company who he saw were giving unsatisfactory answers and fencing the questions, was perfectly untrue; that he browbeat any one of those witnesses was utterly false—if he had attempted to do any such thing the noble Chairman and the rest of the Committee would at once have checked him. And here it might be right that he should step aside and say that he had no interest against the Dublin and Galway Railway; that he knew nothing of that or any rival Company; and that he never was concerned with any railway except in one instance, and that was twenty years ago, when he held twenty-five shares in a railway for a few weeks, having been desired by some gentlemen of the town of Liverpool to patronise it, by giving his name (having been connected with the town), but he disposed of them as soon as he could. "Having the indecency in a railroad case to demand whether their shares were at a premium,"—(it was one of the very things to be inquired into)—"and being answered in the affirmative, declaring he would take care to have them at a discount;" as if he could have done so! It was evidently untrue—if he had said anything at all. He said, probably, that when this evidence came out—evidence of a parish pauper who could not read and write being put down as having paid 175*l.* deposit, and having an allotment of shares to the amount of 7,500*l.*—it was probable they would soon be at a discount—that would be a very natural observation. "And ultimately suppressing the evidence which disproved the case he was anxious to establish." That was impossible; and if any man of common sense, not being in a violent fury when he wrote this, had reflected for a moment, he would have seen that no Member of a Committee had the power of suppressing evidence. But he would tell their Lordships what this passage meant, and a most precious jumble and falsification it was. After the Committee had seen how all these things were done, a witness was produced to show that what had been done with reference to the Dublin and Galway Railway Bill was done in all other Railway Bills. They said it might be wrong, but there was no peculiarity in it; and to prove this they produced Mr. Joseph Parke, an attorney, very well known about the Houses of Parliament as an attorney. He was produced in the extremity of the case to give his evidence. He appeared totally unconnected, and it was supposed that he had no connexion with this railway at all; but the manner in which he gave his statement led him (Lord Brougham) to believe that he was connected with the railway, or, at any rate, that he had a great feeling for it. Be that, however, as it might, he told the Committee that this sort of thing was done every day; that it was done on the York, on the Western, and on other railroads. He was asked whether he knew this of his own knowledge; and his reply was, that he had been connected with the lines only when before Parliament; and when he was further asked whether he had anything to do with the issuing, the allotment, or the giving of shares, his answer was,—"Oh no, I had nothing to do with the lines before they came before Parliament." He was ready to vouch for what he believed to be the truth, but he knew nothing about it; he knew nothing except from hearsay; and it was clear the Committee could not take that as evidence. This gentleman had not been sworn, but, if his evidence had been of value to either side, he would indisputably have been sent to be sworn, and then his evidence would have been received. Finding, however, that he knew nothing, the Committee saw he could tell nothing; and, if he had been sworn fifty times over, he could not have given hearsay in evidence, and, consequently, he was not sworn and not examined. But Mr. Parkes put the Committee in the way of obtaining evidence; for when he was asked who would probably be able to give evidence on the acts of the York Company, his reply was, that most probably the secretary could. The secretary of the York Company was accordingly sent for by the Committee, who thoroughly believed from Mr. Parkes's statement, that he was coming to speak for and to bolster up the agents, the secretary, the attorney, and the brokers. The next day the secretary of the York came and was sworn, and anything equal to the contrast and the striking difference between the proceedings of the York Company, with its respectable directors and secretary and agents, and this Dublin and Galway line, he had never in his life seen, and it was impossible to conceive. This showed the small use of the examination of Mr. Parkes, for Mr. Parkes thought they had done the same thing. With respect to the Dublin and Galway Railway, out of 970 applicants for shares, only 111 had given any reference as to character or solvency; whereas, the rule of the London and York was never to receive any applications for shares without a reference; so that all the rest of the applications beyond the 111 would have been thrown in the fire by the London and York. But it was not so with the Dublin and Galway. What, however, did the House think this Company did with these 111 cases? The London and York sent a man about for more than six weeks, making inquiries and asking whether the individuals were such as they had themselves described. He gave his report, and according to that report the shares were allotted. What did the Dublin and Galway do? Did they examine into these 111 cases? They made inquiry as to just twenty-nine. Of these twenty-nine they found that about fourteen, or one-half, gave false and fictititious accounts, that they were unknown at the place to which references were made, or that they were paupers. Therefore, they stopped; they did not inquire into the other eighty cases, fearing, no doubt, that if they proceeded further they might fare worse. They proceeded, therefore, to make their allotment of shares, and amongst others to Margaret Meredith, who was described as of Lower Tooting, Surrey, with the memorandum, "Inquire of Mr. Edward Bayley, Stockwell, Surrey." Did they inquire? No; because said Mr. Heseltine, he thought a respectable address was given when it was Lower Tooting, Surrey. So that every resident of Lower Tooting was held fit to receive an allotment of 7,500*l.* shares, and capable of paying a deposit of 175*l.* This party, however, happened to be a pauper, and when she was asked whether she had written the application, she replied she could only say she could not read it, for she could never read or write in her life. But there was the broker's certificate of her respectability, and shares were allotted her. Among Mr. Heseltine's, the broker's, certificates, also, was that of Mr. Penton, a person who had never existed at all, and of a man who had been for six years in the West Indies, and knew nothing of the application. All these were duly certified by Mr. Heseltine, the broker, and were declared respectable. The way in which the applications were examined was, that as the 1st of November was a leisure day, the broker sat down at the office and examined 800 or 900 of them in four hours, giving about twelve seconds to each. He only wished that other business could be despatched with equal facility in an equally short space of time. That was the result of the comparison between the London and York proceedings and the proceedings of the Dublin and Galway Company. Was he right, then, in saying that to talk of suppressing evidence was not only not the truth, but was the very reverse of the truth? The Committee had sent for the witness, whom all expected to give evidence in favour of the Company, and he had given this damning evidence. Then it was complained that the question was put, "Had he ever been a candidate for a lucrative employment in a rival railway?" Why, there was no slander in putting that question; but it was no question of the Committee's own—it was still existing in the handwriting of the petitioner whose petition was referred to the Committee. Now with respect to General Caulfield. It was supposed that he had been sharply examined; but he left the Committee Room, after the second day's examination, perfectly satisfied. On the first day of his examination, indeed, he made but a poor figure; but no question was put which was not respectful to that respectable individual, and he believed that, after the second day, he left the Committee perfectly satisfied, as might be seen by the last question and answer of the last examination. These were the facts of this case, and he would add only one other circumstance. It was a singular thing that there should be a very accurate account given in the newspaper of this speech, and he much doubted whether the words were heard in the place where they were pretended to have been uttered. In the paper which he saw, it was stated that "the hon. Member spoke in so low a tone of voice as to be quite inaudible," and others had told him the same thing; nevertheless the speech was given at full length. Now, he warned some people of one thing—that they were protected for what they said in Parliament, but they had no protection in printing their speeches. Lord Abingdon had been sent to prison for having printed and published a speech he had delivered, and Mr. Creevy was also punished, though he published his speech, optimâ fide, to protect himself against a gross misrepresentation of what he had said, which was more libellous than what he published. He (Lord Brougham) was his counsel, but he was nevertheless convicted, and when the House of Commons was called upon to interfere with the matter as a breach of privilege, that great upholder of privilege, Mr. C. W. Wynn, declared that it was no privilege. There was another salutary warning he would give for the benefit of the newspapers. It was no defence for a newspaper, if it printed a libel on any man, to say that it was uttered by a Member in his place in Parliament. God forbid that such a defence should be good; for if the 1,100 Members in that and the other Assembly could with impunity utter these, or any other words, and if with impunity the newspapers were allowed to publish what was so uttered, this country would be intolerable. It was quite as well that he should state this. Then came the question what were they to do in this case? He left that question in the hands of their Lordships. They held the doctrines of privilege, and he was anxous to see how the privilege men would act in this case. They had lately decided that a Committee of that House could not discharge its duty unless the witnesses who should give evidence before them should be protected; possibly their Lordships might think it quite as necessary to protect the Members of the Committee; he knew not whether they would so think, but he left the case in their hands. If they chose, they might allow a newspaper to print anything. His opinion was, that the courts of law were the proper places for redress, and he for one would proceed before them rather than in that House by force and power. One word more as to whether this pretended speech was ever delivered. He was disposed to think that it was not. He entertained a high respect for the Commons' House of Parliament; he held in high respect their privileges when they were not exceeded; he held in high value their powers, which were just and right, when they were not abused; he venerated that body as the popular branch of our mixed institutions; and he knew it to be the most essential of all. Therefore, he who knew how high the privilege doctrines were there held—he, who knew that their Lordships held their privileges high, but the other House of Parliament held them higher still—he, who knew that they had lately fought with the courts of law, and although beaten for a moment had afterwards gained the victory—he, who knew that the Commons had threatened even to proceed against the Judges of the land whom their Lordships had never menaced—he, who knew that the Commons held this as the corner stone of their privileges, namely, that those privileges were not confined to one House, but common to both—he must believe that, unless he should cease for ever after to respect that House of Parliament, unless all the veneration he had felt should no longer be entertained for that House as at present composed, but for an ideal and abstract House as it ought to be composed—he who held that House in veneration until they should by their own deeds make it impossible for him any longer to respect them—he, therefore, knew that the Commons must give their Lordships the same privileges which they arrogated to themselves, and in proportion as they were high privilegians they must be most cautious and most tremblingly alive to sanctioning any breach of their own privileges. Gracious God! could he, with those feelings, for one instant believe it possible that such ribaldry as he had read to their Lordships was suffered to be spoken in that House, against a Peer of Parliament acting upon a Select and Secret Committee, and not one word of reprobation, of censure, of reprimand uttered? Did the House of Commons hear those words—could they have heard them—could they have heard any man, however much he was to be pitied for the fury into which his passions had hurried him—whether they were sordid passions arising from disappointment of expected gains, or whether it was passion arising from a less reprehensible and despicable motive—he meant the wrong-headed notion that the question of which complaint had been made impugned the character and conduct of the individual to whom he had alluded, whilst it had not the remotest tendency to cast a slur upon him? But whether in one sense or the other, that House was bound, if they heard those words, and if they meant ever to talk of privilege while they had any existence, they were bound, he said, to protect their Lordships, and the Members of their Secret Committees, from the foul abuse which was represented to have been thus uttered in their presence. But what followed? At the end of the last sentence were these words, there being no reprimand from the chair, no Motion that the words be taken down, no censure, no disapproval, not one word, not even a whisper—"the Motion for the production of the letter was then agreed to." Therefore he said that this which was so represented to be said, must be falsely represented: he would not believe that the House of Commons had heard those things. He must believe that either the words were not spoken, and were a fabrication, or that if spoken they were not heard by the House, as the other papers said they did not hear them; or that if they were heard, it was so indistinctly that no one knew well what the matter was they contained; and that supposition alone made it possible for any one who wished to retain a vestige of respect for that House of Parliament to believe, if the words in question had been heard, that they had been allowed to pass without any animadversion. With these observations, in which he trusted he had said nothing to wound the feelings of any man—he had cautiously abstained from any offensive topic, unless where he was bound to say that gross falsehoods had been stated—probably from some misunderstanding, misconstruction, or misinformation—for there were agents before the Committee, but none of the parties in question—with these observations he would leave the question in their Lordships' hands.

The Earl of Besborough said, he wished to correct one error of the noble and learned Lord. It was not a Select and Secret Committee, but a Select Committee, from which all persons were excluded except the witnesses and parties admitted by leave on both sides. On the first day on which the Committee met, the agents put into his hands, as chairman, the names of certain witnesses whom they wished to have summoned before the Committee. On the second day they put some papers into his hands, with observations as to the mode in which those witnesses were to be examined. The agents for the opposition party also stated to him that, as the agents of the promoters had been admitted on the first day, they thought it would be but fair that they should be admitted also; and accordingly they were admitted. Those were the only persons admitted. Observations were made opposite to each name. His noble and learned Friend examined the witnesses from the Papers before him; and he had no doubt that all the questions, or the main purport of them, were found in those Papers. The agents of the promoters of the Bill applied to him for a copy of the Paper containing the heads of observations; he told them he could not give it them without consultation; and the agent for the Bill had, he believed, afterwards been furnished with a copy of the observations which had been handed to the Committee for the examination of the witnesses. With reference to the suppression of evidence, he must confirm the statement of his noble Friend. The gentleman was called in, who gave a detailed statement of certain facts, and when he was asked whether he knew them of his own knowledge, or had only heard them from others, he stated that he had heard them from others. Therefore he (the Earl of Bessborough) ordered the shorthand writer to strike this evidence out of the evidence. A gentleman gave a detailed statement of facts, but said he did not know them of his own knowledge. He could only say, that with respect to the whole case, he was sure he should be borne out by the other noble Lords who were on the Committee, when he said that the proceedings were conducted in the fairest way to all parties. An application was made to him to send to the House of Commons to ask for leave to examine Mr. Fitzstephen French; the Committee, however, were of opinion that it was not necessary, but they did not come to that decision from any disrespect to that gentleman.

Lord Brougham wished to add that he had delivered in the Papers containing suggested questions without reading them: the inkstand was before his noble Friend, and the Papers laid across the table between him and the inkstand. The reason why Mr. French was not examined was, that there was no charge whatever against him. The question whether he had not canvassed for a lucrative employment, which had needlessly excited so much irritation, was negatived, and he (Lord Brougham) did not think it signified a straw, or he should have examined him.

The Earl of Wicklow said, that after the statement of his noble Friend, he could not but feel persuaded that as gross a breach of privilege as he had ever known, had been committèd. It was impossible for their Lordships to abstain from taking notice of it; but what notice ought to be taken he had not had sufficient experience to give an opinion. After such a case had been brought forward in so strong a manner, and after the noble and learned Lord had so completely succeeded in vindicating himself from the outrageous attack made upon him, it was necessary for the House to determine what farther steps ought to be adopted. Much depended upon the wishes of the noble and learned Lord; but if he left the matter in the hands of the House, it seemed to him (Lord Wicklow) that it would be right to summon the printer and reporter of the Times newspaper to the bar, that their Lordships might know whether it was or was not a correct report. Other newspapers stated that the hon. Member delivered himself in so low a tone that his words could not be taken down; therefore it was fit, in the first place, to ascertain whether the words imputed had or had not been spoken. Under any circumstances, it was a gross breach of privilege — an attack made upon a Member of the House of Lords, in the execution of his duty in one of the Committees. It was the duty of the House to protect him.

Lord Brougham suggested that it was too serious a matter to be hurried. He thought there should be no further proceeding in it that day.

The Duke of Wellington remarked, that the subject required a good deal of consideration before the House decided what course it would adopt. The proposition of his noble Friend was, that the editor of the newspaper should be called to the bar.

The Earl of Wicklow interposed that he say that he had only suggested such a course, not submitted it as a proposition.

The Duke of Wellington wished to observe upon it only as a suggestion. The question to be asked of the editor must be, whether he had or had not been guilty of a breach of one of the privileges of the other House of Parliament? Whether he had published what was or what was not said in the House of Commons? The answer in either case would implicate him in a breach of privilege. He begged to suggest to their Lordships that the farther consideration of the subject ought to be adjourned till Thursday, in order that in the meantime the best course of proceeding might be considered on what seemed to him a very grave case.

The Lord Chancellor observed, that the printer of the newspaper might be asked generally from what source he derived his information.

The further discussion was then adjourned till Thursday.

COLLEGES (IRELAND) BILL.] Moved that the House do resolve itself into Committee.

Lord Stanley said, that he had a trifling Amendment to propose in relation to the proviso of the 14th Clause, which proviso was somewhat at variance with the Clause. It had reference to the lecture rooms for religious instruction, and he proposed to retain the proviso that no pupil should be required to receive any religious instruction but such as was approved by his parents or guardians. He would take this opportunity of alluding to the suggestion of a noble Marquess (Marquess of Lansdowne) last night, that Ministers should give the new Colleges the privileges of a University. He admitted that the grant of the power to confer degrees seemed a natural complement of the measure. Ministers were of opinion that it would be incomplete without it; but the question required more consideration than it would now be possible to afford to it. Perhaps the most satisfactory course, on some accounts, would be to affiliate the new Colleges with Trinity College, Dublin; but their Lordships would be aware that there were difficulties in the way of such an arrangement. Then came the question whether the new Colleges ought not to be associated as a separate University, the general meeting to be held either at a distinct place or alternately at one of the Colleges. It would obviously be highly desirable, upon this and other points, that the opinions and wishes of the governing bodies should be ascertained, and for this and other reasons, delay seemed not inexpedient. Ministers had this object distinctly in view, and, as he had stated already, without the attainment of it the measure before the House would be imperfect.

The Marquess of Lansdowne was quite satisfied with the explanation of the noble Lord, and was extremely glad to find that what he had suggested, had already been contemplated by Her Majesty's Government. He could easily understand why the object could not be accomplished in the present Session; but he hoped that it would be kept constantly in view. He entertained a very confident opinion that it would not be desirable to place one of the Colleges at the head of the others, but some neighbouring town or even village might be selected as a central position for all. The manner in which University and King's Colleges, London, had been affiliated and formed into one University, would form a useful precedent to guide Ministers in their design to raise the new Irish Colleges into a separate University. If he did not propose any Amendment to the Bill on the subject of the appointment of professors, it was because the arrangement giving the choice to Ministers was only temporary.

Lord Campbell would only offer one suggestion. It appeared that Ministers intended to endow several new Colleges in Ireland; three had been previously spoken of, but last night four were mentioned.

Lord Stanley said, that what he meant was, that in future there would be four Colleges in Ireland.

Lord Campbell added, that his suggestion was, that instead of three new Colleges only one should be founded. Great difficulty might be experienced in establishing three Colleges at once, and he doubted whether a sufficient number of pupils would be obtained in the first instance. If only one general College were opened, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Roman Catholics, would be brought together and united in one common pursuit of knowledge, and they might form friendships which would last for life. The manner in which the whole of Ireland would soon be intersected by railroads, would remove all difficulty of conveyance, and the pupils from all quarters might be collected in one establishment. To this establishment the power of granting degrees might at once be given, and it might be raised to the dignified position now occupied by Trinity College, Dublin.

The Marquess of Clanricarde could not agree with his noble and learned Friend, and was convinced that the foundation of only one College would not satisfy the wants or the wishes of the people of Ireland. He saw no reason why the new Colleges should not be affiliated with Trinity College, Dublin, and such an arrangement would give the greatest satisfaction to the main body of the people. Trinity College had not had justice done to it, as regarded the number of men of letters and science she had produced.

Lord Monteagle entered into some comparative details connected with the new Colleges, and urged that the establishment of a new University was necessary to render the design of Ministers complete. It was very fit that time should be taken to consider the best means of attaining this object; and he apprehended that delay would be attended with no practical disadvantage.

The Earl of Ellenborough thought that difficulty would be found in the outset, in procuring a sufficient number of persons capable of filling the office of professor: no doubt Government would use their best exertions, but he doubted how far they would be successful. It was impossible at once to create a College like Eton, or a University like Oxford; lives must pass away before it was accomplished, and reputation could not be conferred by Act of Parliament. The real benefit to be derived from such institutions was the formation of good citizens with kindly feelings towards each other, generated by early association.

House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Hamilton, from J. Dunn, W. Goddard, and R. J. T. Orpen, Solicitors of the High Court of Chancery (Ireland), against Taxing Master Court of Chancery (Ireland) Bill.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

SMALL DEBTS (No. 3) BILL.] On the Motion of the Solicitor General the House went into Committee on this Bill.

On the 1st Clause,

Mr. Wakley said, he must enter his protest against proceeding with the Bill, because since the Bill was brought down from the other House, thirteen new clauses had been introduced, and three schedules had been added, which hon. Members had never before seen. He should feel it his duty to move that the chairman do report progress, and obtain leave to sit again. He would only ask for one day, in order to consider these new clauses.

Sir James Graham said, he was very sorry that, owing to a mistake of the printer, the Bill had not been put into the hands of hon. Members at an earlier period. If the hon. Member pressed his Motion, he (Sir J. Graham) should not think he was doing his duty if he did not at once accede to it. He did not think, however, that there was anything in the new clauses that would be found objectionable, and he would postpone the Bill till Thursday.

Mr. T. Duncombe objected very strongly to that part of the Bill providing that the wages of workmen should be arrested in the hands of their masters for the payment of their debts. He objected to that clause operating in any case, except that of yearly salaries. Weekly wages were very uncertain, sometimes more, sometimes less. If that part of the Bill were persisted in, he thought that it would be found to operate to the extreme dissatisfaction of all parties.

The Solicitor General said, he thought that the effect of that part of the Bill had been misapprehended by the hon. Member. The clause objected to contained no power for the attachment of wages on their passage from the hands of the master to the workman. It would only operate in cases where the wages were more than sufficient to supply the means of life, in which case the surplus would be attached, and that only on the order of a Judge.

Sir J. Graham said, he had collected from the hon. Gentleman that it would be agreeable to all parties to postpone the Bill till to-morrow.

House resumed. Committee to sit again.

LUNATICS.] On the Motion of Lord Ashley, the Lunatics' Bill was read a third time.

Mr. T. Duncombe proposed the introduction of a clause limiting the Bill to three years, and from that time to the then next Session of Parliament. The hon. Member again urged his former objections against the payment to the Commissioners of such enormous salaries.

The Clause brought up and read a first time.

On the Motion that it be read a second time,

Mr. Hume supported the Motion, because, in his opinion, it was of the utmost importance that the public should see how the Bill worked. He also contended, that, as the Commissioners were to be paid such large salaries, their daily attendance ought to be enforced.

Lord Ashley defended the permanent character of the Bill; and contended that it was absolutely necessary to pay large salaries, in order to have men of talent and standing in their professions as Commissioners. In his opinion it was much more economical that the Bill should be permanent.

The House divided:—Ayes 13; Noes, 43: Majority 30.

Clause rejected.

Sir C. Napier moved the introduction of a clause to the effect that any parish having a population of 100,000 persons, and rated at a rental of 500,000*l.*, be enabled to erect an asylum for itself.

Clause read a first time.

On the Question that it be read a second time,

Sir J. Graham objected to the clause being introduced into the Bill, because it was nothing less than engrafting a new Bill upon the one at present under discussion. In fact, it was subject matter for a private Bill. He also objected to the clause, because it would break up the county rate in favour of the parishes of Marylebone, St. Pancras, and St. George, and be in a manner unjust to the other parishes of the county of Middlesex.

Mr. Hume thought that the clause could not with any consistency or fairness be introduced into the Bill, and would suggest that it might be better to introduce a private Bill to effect the purpose of the clause.

Sir J. Graham said, he could give no premature opinion on the subject of a private Bill, because he should like to know what the ratepayers of a part of Paddington, who were a portion of the parish of Marylebone, and a very poor portion indeed, would say to the introduction of a private Bill.

Clause negatived.

Mr. T. Duncombe protested against the appointment of medical and legal men as Commissioners with such enormous salaries. He would beg to move, as an Amendment, "That the salary be 1,200*l.* a year, instead of 1,500*l.*"

The House divided on the Question that the words "five hundred" stand part of the Bill:—Ayes 32; Noes 13: Majority 19.

Further proceedings postponed.

House adjourned.

After five o'clock,

RAJAH OF SATTARA.] Mr. Hume rose to bring forward the Motion of which he had given notice relative to the Rajah of Sattara. He felt, he said, great reluctance to interfere between the House and an adjourned debate, but having arrived at that late period of the Session, if he let that opportunity slip he was afraid—

Sir R. Peel said, it was in general very convenient that they should proceed consecutively with an adjourned debate; therefore, with the leave of the hon. Gentlemen, he would ask whether, if the discussion upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose were over in time to resume the debate upon the affairs of New Zealand, the hon. Gentlemen who had other Motions were prepared to give way for that purpose? It would be a great convenience to have it brought to a close.

Mr. Ewart was placed in some difficulty by the request. He stood pledged to several parties to bring on the Motion which stood in his name, and he feared another opportunity would not offer during the Session. He stood in a peculiar position ; but if his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose withdrew his Motion, he would follow his example.

Mr. Hume said his statement would be very short, and as it was a matter in which justice had already been too long delayed, he trusted he should be allowed to go on. His object was to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that she will be graciously pleased to direct an impartial inquiry into the Charges against Pertaub Shean, late Rajah of Sattara, and also whether he has been furnished with a Copy of the Charges and Evidence against him on which he was, in 1839, deposed from his Raj, and sent an exile and a State prisoner to Benares; and that Her Majesty will be pleased further to direct inquiry to be made into the charges of Bribery and Corruption brought by Krushnajee Sudasew Bhidey (as stated in the Papers recently laid before this House), against Colonel Ovans, whilst Resident at Sattara, and against Baliajee Punt Nathoo, who assisted Colonel Ovans at the Court of Sattara, and is now a Prisoner under the East India Company, as a Sirdar of the second class."

The hon. Member then continued : Sir, I cannot, consistently with what I believe to be my duty, postpone my Motion. I will, however, be as brief as the facts which it is necessary to bring before the House, will allow me to be. I have always been most reluctant to take up the time of the House upon this question ; and have, therefore, waited long to see if Her Majesty's Government would take some steps towards granting to the unfortunate Prince, whose name is now before us, the trial to which the meanest of our fellow subjects is entitled, and always obtains, before punishment is inflicted. When I last brought this subject before the House, it was for the purpose of presenting a petition from the Rajah, the prayer of which I will now read. The injury complained of by the Rajah is stated in the following words :—

"That your Petitioner, for many years a faithful ally, and a great feudatory of Her Majesty's Indian Empire, has recently, by the East India Company's Government, under the accusation of treason and secret hostility —crimes which he never even in imagination conceived—on evidence corrupt and one-sided, as well as inconsistent and contradictory—without a trial, and without the opportunity of self-defence—been despoiled of his throne and dominions, and consigned to exile."

He then proceeds to say—

"With regard to the evidence, oral and documentary, which the whole power and influence of the British Government have been for years employed to procure and accumulate against your Petitioner, it has not been in his power to offer the clearest disproof; because, although he has been pronounced guilty, and deposed upon that evidence, he has been peremptorily denied all knowledge of it."

The Rajah concludes his Appeal to this House in the following words :—

"Wherefore your Petitioner respectfully solicits from your honourable House a consideration of his case, and of the treatment he has received, as well as the high character he has invariably maintained amongst his people and the Princes of India. While he implores from your honourable House that justice which, had his lot been that of a peasant, it would have been his right to claim from the laws of the British realm, he cannot forget that it is as a dethroned and exiled Prince that he appeals to your honourable House. He trusts, that the vast power which has been placed by Divine Providence in the hands of the Government of Great Britain will not be exercised to his continued wrong? and he hopes the injustice and degradation which he has suffered in innocence, will not be permitted to appear on the page of history, to tarnish the glory of the British name, and the conduct and character of that Government in India, towards a Sovereign, once its honoured ally, now its helpless prisoner."

Such, Sir, is the substance of the petition which I had the honour to present to this House on the behalf of the Rajah ; and I should have been well satisfied, if it had led to that impartial inquiry, which is all that either the Rajah or his friends in this country have ever desired. Before I go further, I must beg permission to state to the House in what estimation the Rajah was held previous to the period when the accusations which have been brought against him were first made. At the conclusion of the Mahratta war, which ended with the entire overthrow of Bajee Rao, the Bramin Peishwa, or Prime Minister of the Rajah of Sattara, the ex-Rajah was elevated by the British Government to the guddee, or throne of the Principality of Sattara, and was placed by Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone under the special care of Captain Grant Duff. I shall now read to the House a letter which was unanimously adopted by the Court of Directors, in the month of December, 1835, and was sent to the Rajah, accompanied by a present of a splendid sword. This letter is as follows :—

"December 29th, 1835.

"Your Highness — We have been highly gratified by the information from time to time, transmitted to us by our Government, on the subject of your Highness's exemplary fulfilment of the duties of that elevated situation in which it has pleased Providence to place you.

"A course of conduct so suitable to your Highness's exalted station, and so well calculated to promote the prosperity of your dominions and the happiness of your people, as that which you have wisely and uniformly pursued, while it reflects the highest honour on your own character, has imparted to our minds the feelings of unqualified satisfaction and pleasure. The liberality, also, which you have displayed in executing, at your own cost, various public works of great utility, and which has so greatly raised your reputation in the eyes of the princes and people of India, gives you an additional claim to our approbation, respect, and applause.

"Impressed with these sentiments, the Court of Directors of the East India Company have unanimously resolved to transmit to you a sword, which will be presented to you through the Government of Bombay, and which we trust you will receive with satisfaction, as a token of their high esteem and regard.

"With sincere wishes for your health and prosperity, we subscribe ourselves in the name of the Court—Your Highness's most faithful friends, (Signed) "W. S. Clarke, Chairman.

"J. R. Carnac, Deputy."

Unhappily, before this letter and present reached Bombay, there had been a misunderstanding between the Rajah and the Bombay Government respecting the title of the former to the sovereignty over some jagheers, or feudal estates, which had been secured to the Rajah by the Treaty of 1819, in the event of their lapsing, by the death of their incumbents, or the failure of heirs by birth, or adoption. This unfortunate quarrel, in which, however, the Rajah was entirely in the right, gave the native enemies of the Prince an opportunity of concocting plots for his dethronement; and these plots were in progress when the Court's complimentary letter reached India. As I deem it of the highest importance that the real character of the Rajah should be known, I will read the testimony which has been given by the political residents or ambassadors at his Court, for a period of twenty years; observing, that these hon. and gallant Gentlemen had the opportunity of narrowly observing the Rajah's conduct and dispositions, from day to day, through the whole of that long series of consecutive years. The first evidence which I shall adduce is that of Captain Grant Duff, who was the Rajah's early adviser and friend. This officer, writing to the Rajah's Vakeel, Rungoo Bapojee, under date the 31st October, 1842, says—

"He" (the Rajah) "never could be guilty of what has been alleged against him. I believe he never for one moment entertained inimical intentions towards the British Government. The whole story of intriguing with Goa, and of corrupting the sepoys, I also believe the Rajah had nothing to do with, and I think his deposal was impolitic and unjust. I have always said, that, judging from all I ever knew of the Rajah, I do not believe him guilty of the silly crimes with which he has been charged, and for which he has, in my humble judgment, been unjustly set aside."

The next evidence is that of Major General Briggs, who succeeded Captain Duff, and was at the Rajah's Court for more than four years. This testimony was borne so recently as the 18th of last month (June) in the Court of Proprietors, and is in reply to a charge of immorality brought against the Rajah, by an infamous Brahmin of the name of Ballajee Punt Nathoo. General Briggs says—

"I had the honour to fill the situation of Resident at the Court of Sattara for a period of four years, during which time I had peculiar opportunities of forming a judgment on the private character of the late ruling Prince; and I have no hesitation in saying, that I consider the charge referred to a most atrocious libel. During my official experience, I have been brought into communication with many foreign Princes, both in India and elsewhere: and I do deliberately affirm, that I never met with one whose moral character stood higher, or in whose conduct the utter absence of all licentiousness was more remarkable, than in that of the deposed Rajah of Sattara."

I shall now quote the emphatic testimony of Major General Robertson, who is, at this moment, one of the Directors of the East India Company. This high-minded officer was more than six years at the Rajah's Court, and in answering the charge so explicitly refuted by his predecessor, General Briggs, he says—

"In justice to the character of the Rajah of Sattara, I beg to confirm what has just been said by Major General Briggs; I have no hesitation in saying, that the charge is false. It rests solely on the assertion of the Brahmin Ballajee Punt Nathoo, who gave his evidence secretly and anonymously before the Commission in 1836. From my knowledge of the Rajah, I have no doubt that the story is utterly false. I must beg also to say a word on the epithet of 'imbecile,' which has been bestowed upon the Rajah. Perhaps, as I was for years in the habit of almost daily intercourse with the Rajah, hon. Gentlemen will not object to receive my testimony on such a point, in preference to that of the hon. proprietor, Mr. Weeding. My testimony in reference to the Rajah's imbecility is this—and I set it over against that of those who know nothing about him—that I never knew a more able man in the transaction of public business, or a Prince of more perfect honour or spotless integrity."

In conclusion, on this part of the subject, I will read the evidence given by General Lodwick, who succeeded General Robertson, and who, in a speech delivered at the India House on the 8th of February, 1840, says—

"I can positively declare that, during the period I was Resident at Sattara, I never expressed a wish to the Rajah that was not readily attended to: roads were constructed, the condition of his jagheerdars was ameliorated, in fact, he was liberal in every respect, generous to his servants, of the best domestic character, evincing the possession of a kindness springing from a happy temperament of mind and body. The Rajah collected the whole of his revenues without oppression."

Sir, here you have the testimony of the most unexceptionable witnesses to the character of the Rajah during twenty years, added to that of the unanimous opinion of the Directors in 1836. Three charges have been preferred against the Rajah. I will state what they are. The first was in 1836, and was that of the Rajah having had an interview with two native officers of a British regiment, with a view of corrupting them from their allegiance. The second was, that the Rajah carried on a clandestine correspondence with Appa Sahib, the ex-Rajah of Nagpore—at the time a State prisoner and a pensioner at the Court of the Rajah of Joudpore. The third was, that the Rajah intrigued with Don Manoel, the Viceroy of the Portuguese Settlement of Goa, for the purpose of bringing 30,000 European troops to India, to drive the British from the country. Sir, I once believed these charges were true; for I could not bring myself to think that the Government of India would dethrone a native prince, like the Rajah of Sattara, without the fullest and most conclusive evidence of his guilt; but having given much attention to the subject, and having read all the documents relating to the case, I have been brought to the conclusion that the whole has been a series of the most infamous and wicked plots against the Rajah—hatched by his enemies, and too readily believed and acted upon by the Government, when they found the Rajah was determined to maintain his right to the jagheers, in opposition to the erroneous view which had been taken of that question. Sir, the charge of attempting the allegiance of the sepoys, was preferred during General Lodwick's time, and I must say that the conduct of Sir Robert Grant in the affair was anything but creditable. Instead of giving the Rajah an opportunity of rebutting the evidence of the two sepoys, he sent "a paper of hints" to the Resident, General Lodwick, instructing that officer how he might entrap the Rajah. I will read to the House what General Lodwick himself says on this subject, in a letter to the Court of Directors, dated 9th October, 1840.

"The system was now changed. All was energy in devising schemes by which the plot should be matured and detected; for which I should have been at a loss to account, had I not been told that, in a hasty moment, 'a report of the case had been sent to the Supreme Government and to the Court of Directors, with an assurance that the Government placed full reliance on the testimony of the native officers; that many persons of weight went so far as to think the Rajah ought to be sent to Bombay to have his conduct investigated, and that possession should be taken of his country; but that, at all events, the affair could not be quashed, and the question was, how to make the inquiry most effective, though it was feared nothing more could be expected from the Rajah.' And a paper of hints was sent to me, suggesting, 'that the native officers should ask to see the Rajah, tell him they had heard their part of the plot had been discovered, beg that he would protect them, either by advancing money to escape with, or a pass under his hand and seal to insure them service; that if he gave them money, the evidence would be strong; if a paper, convincing. If, however, he should give them up to me, with loud complaints of calumny, in this case I was to pretend to secure them, and suspicion being hushed, an opportunity would be afforded of securing the principal agents.

"Honour and honesty being my motto in public as in private life, I spurned such shifts as these, and left the plot to develop itself, without secretly tempting the Rajah to afford me proof of his having aided it, determining to demand the delivery to me of the persons accused whenever the matter should transpire, and to take no active part in the Rajah's ruin.

At the proper moment, and in exact conformity with instructions which I had demanded from the Government, I went to the palace, informed His Highness that some of his subjects were accused of plotting against the British Government, and required them to be delivered over to me. In an hour from that time they were at the residency, the Rajah giving them up instantly."

General Lodwick not being willing to be employed as the Government wished, a Commission was appointed, consisting of the Resident, Colonel Ovans, and Mr. Willoughby, the Secretary to Government. This was a secret Commission, sent to try the Rajah in his own capital. What will the House think of this inquiry, when I tell them, that the Rajah was denied the right of having a person present to take notes and cross-examine the witnesses? Yet such was the case. General Lodwick pointed out the injustice of the refusal, and made a special application to Government in the Rajah's behalf; but no counsel or vakeel was allowed to be present. The two Commissioners from Bombay refused to pay their respects to the Rajah—an indignity never before offered to any native Prince—they also suggested that the Rajah should, without this ceremony, be sent for to the Commission; but the Resident positively refused to be the bearer of such an insulting message. Well, Sir, when the Commission had nearly closed their proceedings, they intimated to the Rajah that he might attend and hear the evidence given against him. He did so; it was read over to him in the Hindustanee language, with which the Rajah was only imperfectly acquainted. At the conclusion, the Rajah requested to be furnished with a copy of the depositions in the Mahratta language, and said, that when that was done, he would send in his reply. A promise was made that the depositions should be sent to him; but, although he frequently afterwards repeated his request, they were not given; and to the present hour the Rajah has never received a particle of the evidence against him, nor so much as a statement of the charges which the Government were, for years, prosecuting against him. The evidence in the case of the sepoys was of the most absurd and contradictory character; and though all on one side, was found insufficient to justify the conviction of the Rajah: in fact, one of the most able members of the Supreme Government declared that he had sought in vain for a point on which to rest a belief of the Rajah's guilt. The Nagpore case is altogether too ridiculous to require serious notice in this House. It is a story about sending a pair of slippers to, and receiving a sword from, a man who was at the time in circumstances of absolute dependance and poverty; and yet it was said, that to this man the Rajah applied for 300,000*l.* to aid him in obtaining troops from Europe. The third charge relating to Goa has been proved to be without foundation in any of its parts. The papers produced to prove the charge are the admitted fabrications of one man, being neither in the handwriting of the Rajah on the one hand, nor of the Viceroy on the other. The seals attached to them are also forgeries, being neither the State seals of the Rajah, nor the seals of any of his predecessors, either Rajahs or Peishwas. These Papers, too, were obtained by Colonel Ovans from a gang robber, by a bribe of 400 rupees, or 40*l.* sterling. But, Sir, I would ask this House whether it be possible that the Bombay Government and Her Majesty's Ministers could believe this charge to be true, and yet refrain from taking any notice of it as regarded the conduct of a Portuguese Governor representing a Power in ancient and friendly alliance with this nation? If the Rajah was guilty, Don Manoel, the Viceroy, was equally so; and if he was guilty, it was the duty of the British Government to bring his acts to the notice of his Sovereign, and to demand his punishment, and the most ample explanation from those whose confidence and authority he had so shamefully abused. Sir, on hearing of this extraordinary charge, I myself wrote to Don Manoel, at the time filling a high situation in the household of the Queen of Portugal; and, in reply, received a solemn declaration, made in the presence of a public notary at Lisbon, to the effect that the charge was utterly false and groundless. Such I honestly believe to be the opinion of Her Majesty's Ministers, in proof of which I may refer to the words of Sir John Hobhouse, late President of the Board of Control, addressed to this House on the 23rd of June, 1842. The language of that right hon. Gentleman, on the occasion to which I refer, was this:—

cused me of dethroning the Rajah of Sattara; a charge almost too absurd to require contradiction. I did not dethrone the Rajah of Sattara. The hon. Member has also accused me of believing that the Rajah of Sattara was about to bring 30,000 Portuguese from Goa to invade British India. Where the hon. Member learned that, I know not: I have seen some trumpery statement in a newspaper to that effect; but there is not a word of truth in it. As President of the Board of Control, I know that those charges were brought against the Rajah of Sattara; but to say, that I believe them, is what the hon. Gentlemen has not the slightest foundation for saying."

If then, Sir, the exculpation of Don Manoel be considered complete, what becomes of the charge against his alleged confederate in crime, the Rajah of Sattara? why is the latter punished, while the charge is considered too ridiculous to be noticed in reference to the former? It is not my purpose, however, to examine the evidence brought forward to criminate the Rajah of Sattara: my object is simply to inquire whether the accused has had the opportunity of establishing his innocence by an examination of, and reply to, the allegations recorded against him; and as it is too late in the Session to move for the appointment of a Select Committee, I have adopted the course of recommending an Address to Her Majesty the Queen. I now beg leave to call the attention of the House, and of Her Majesty's Government, to the contents of the Papers which have been recently printed and laid on the Table. They relate to certain charges brought against Colonel Ovans, and his native assistant, Ballajee Punt Nathoo, by Krushnajee Sudasew Bhidey, a man who was employed to write and send to the Bombay Government a document denouncing the Rajah of Sattara, and twelve other persons, as concerned in a treasonable conspiracy against the British Government. I must be permitted to say, that I have hitherto most studiously abstained from bringing any charges against British officers connected with the dethronement of the Rajah of Sattara. So far from ever attempting to implicate Colonel Ovans, I have refused to believe any thing to his prejudice, and would not even accuse his native assistant of improper conduct, until I had afforded the Court of Directors the means of examining into the nature of the evidence offered in support of the charges against him. This will appear from my printed Letter to the Court, upon page 9 of these Papers. A brief history of the connexion of Krushnajee Sudasew Bhidey, whose petition to this House has been printed, is here necessary, that the House may understand the true state of affairs. Before I come to Krushnajee, however, let me say a word regarding Ballajee Punt Nathoo, the person he has accused. This man is a Brahmin, and was instrumental, many years ago, in betraying his then master, Bajee Rao, the Peishwa, into the hands of the British Government. For this service he has since received a handsome pension, together with a second rank amongst the Sirdars, or chiefs of the Deccan. He was the enemy of the ex-Rajah, in consequence of that Prince refusing to make him his Minister; and throughout these proceedings, he has had the credit of being the chief instigator of the various plots to dethrone the Rajah. On the removal of General Lodwick from Sattara, he was recommended to Colonel Ovans by the Bombay Government, as a fit man to be taken into confidence and employed in the work of getting up evidence against the Rajah. He is a man of considerable talent, and has, it is said, amassed great wealth by the use of the power which he has been able to exercise since the dethronement of the ex-Rajah. To return to Krushnajee; this man, it appears, was the writer of the document I have already referred to, which was sent anonymously to the Bombay Government in the early part of 1837, and was given to Colonel Ovans, with a strict charge that he should ascertain and make known the writer. Colonel Ovans subsequently reported, that he had discovered all the parties concerned in the petition (as the document was called); that it was written at the suggestion of the mother of one of the parties denounced, who was already in prison; that its contents were dictated by the brother of that lady, a person of the name of Sukharam; and that it was posted from Poonah. Now, Sir, it is certainly a very strange and suspicious circumstance, that, after this account had been given to the Government, with an assurance from Colonel Ovans, that its accuracy might be relied upon, that it should appear, upon perfectly unquestionable evidence, that not one word of the story was true. The Papers before this House prove, that a short time after this account had been sent to Bombay, and Colonel Ovans had obtained authority to imprison the parties named in the petition, that officer was waited upon by Krushnajee, and informed that he (Krushnajee) was the real writer; and that he was employed by a man of the name of Lukshmun Punt, who promised him, in the name of the lady from whom the petition purported to emanate, a reward of 1,250 rupees. It is also in evidence in the Printed Papers, that this man laid such documentary proofs before Colonel Ovans, as thoroughly satisfied that officer that his statement was correct; and that he had given the true history of the paper in question. I have nothing to say in vindication of Krushnajee, as far as regards his conduct, respecting the writing of the petition. All I am anxious to do is, to prove to the House that there are ample grounds for believing that every part of the evidence against the Rajah, has been the fruit of conspiracy and forgery. Let it be remembered, that Colonel Ovans has confessed, that all that this man said (before he became the accuser of himself, and his chief agent, Ballajee Punt Nathoo,) was true. If, then, his statement was considered true in the one case, why should it be rejected in the other? But, let us look at the conduct of Colonel Ovans on the receipt of the proofs of the real authorship of the petition. Instead of sending those proofs to Government, he withheld them for nearly a year; as I understand Colonel Ovans has declared that all that Krushnajee has recently alleged, is false; and that he is prepared to prove it. I beg to state, that Colonel Ovans was publicly charged three years ago, in the Court of Proprietors, with having suppressed the evidence of Krushnajee—even after he had demonstrated to his own satisfaction, that it was both "correct and conclusive." When this charge got out to India, Colonel Ovans seemed very anxious that the gentleman who had made it, should be prosecuted for libel. I will read three short paragraphs from his letter to the Bombay Government, showing his desire that the author of the charge should be punished. The letter is dated Sattara, 23rd September, 1842.

Par. 16.—"I think I may safely appeal to Government to say, if the accusations stated to have been read by Mr. G. Thompson, at the India House, on the 29th of July last, can possibly have any foundation.

Par. 17.—"If these atrocious libels, however, were read by Mr. G. Thompson, in the presence of the Honourable Court of Directors, and in the presence of the Proprietors; then, I beg to say, that I put myself, as a public officer, under the protection of the Court, and earnestly solicit that the law officers of the Company may be directed to prosecute that gentleman for these libels.

Par. 18.—"But if this should not be deemed advisable, then I earnestly solicit permission to institute proceedings myself against Mr. G. Thompson; and, in this case, I beg the Honourable Court will be pleased to grant an order to my law advisers, for any papers they may require to lay before the courts of law to prove my case."

Sir, if Colonel Ovans be desirous of vindicating his character from the very grave accusation of suppressing most important judicial evidence, he had better carry out his original wish, and prosecute the gentleman who has made the charge in this country, and who has since repeated it; affording at the same time to Colonel Ovans an opportunity, which he declined to embrace, of refuting that charge before the body to which he belongs. Now, Sir, as it respects the charges contained in the Papers recently laid on the Table of this House: From those papers we learn, that Krushnajee Sudasew Bhidey professed to believe, that he had a claim upon the British Government for the reward originally promised him for writing the petition. Whether this be true or not, one thing is proved by these Papers, that, on his appearing before Colonel Ovans to state his share in the transactions, he received from Colonel Ovans a present of fifty rupees, and was put upon a monthly allowance, which he was permitted to enjoy, until the dethronement of the Rajah; and that he was then dismissed with a present of one hundred rupees, and recommended for employment under the present Rajah. If, therefore, he is now branded as an infamous man, in consequence of his original offence of fabricating a false document, what shall we say of Colonel Ovans, who, when fully cognizant of all the facts of the case, gave him in the first instance a very liberal sum of money, and afterwards kept him in his pay for two years, and finally dismissed him with another large gift? Those who will take the trouble of going through these Papers, will find that the charges which have been brought against Colonel Ovans, and his agent Ballajee Punt, are supported by references to a very large number of highly respectable persons, as well as to a great number of official records. What did the Bombay Government do, on receiving a statement of these charges? Why, they sent them at once to the parties accused, who forthwith report that they are false and unfounded, and recommend that they be dismissed; and they are dismissed accordingly. After seven petitions to the Governor in Council have been thus treated, Krushnajee at lasts forwards his complaints to Mr. John Warden, a judge at Poonah, and the Government agent for the adjustment of all claims upon Sirdars in the Deccan. Mr. Warden viewed these charges in a light very different from the Bombay Government, and at once called upon Krushnajee to send him a list of the witnesses, and proofs he intended to call, in support of his accusations. Here, Sir, is the list prepared by the accuser, and sent to Mr. Warden. It covers three folio pages, and refers to evidence in support of every one of the charges. It is in this paper that we first find a direct charge against Colonel Ovans; and I will read the passage, that the House may decide whether or not it was worthy the attention of those who are bound to preserve the honour and integrity of the British service in India. [The hon. Member read from the Printed Papers a passage from the testimony of Krushnajee, accusing Colonel Ovans of receiving money and presents.] The House will observe, that there are three persons specified as witnesses in support of these charges against Colonel Ovans; that they are all in the service of the present Rajah; and that one of them is no less a person than the Rajah's Minister, with whom Colonel Ovans had, of necessity, much official intercourse. Nothing would have been easier than to have at once established the truth or the falsehood of these charges, which were thus plainly preferred in July, 1843. Mr. Warden deemed it his duty to require at once the personal attendance of Krushnajee, at Poonah; and on his arrival, took from him his solemn affirmation to the truth of his statements, which will be found in page 32 of the Printed Papers. Besides this affirmation, Mr. Warden called upon Krushnajee to enter into recognizances for five thousand rupees, and to find security to the amount of one thousand more, to remain within the British jurisdiction, and to appear and make good his charges; or, in default of doing so, to pay the fine, or to suffer, with his security, two years' imprisonment. The recognizances were given; and Mr. Warden then wrote the following letter to the Government, sending with it, at the time, copies of all the documents which had been handed to him by Krushnajee Sudasew Bhidey. The House will perceive from Mr. Warden's letters, that that officer considered the case as one which was peculiarly deserving the notice of the Government.

"TO THE CHIEF SECRETARY TO GOVERNMENT, BOMBAY.

"Agent's Office, Poonah, 19*th Aug.*, 1844.

"Sir—1. Several months ago, I received by the post a Mahratta paper, of which the enclosed (Krushnajee's Petition of the 14th of October) is a translation.

"2. As it has been usual for the Agent for Sirdars to communicate with the Government on alleged misconduct by Sirdars; as the mode of inquiry asked for in the present instance by Krushnajee Sudasew, is that ordered by Government in the case of Dadjee Appajee Seweya, excepting only that the committee on him was a native one; and as Ballajee Punt Nathoo is not only a Sirdar of the second class, and a pensioner of the British Government, 'during good behaviour,' but is the most favoured of all those who, on the accession of the British Government to the Deccan, were styled 'British adherents;' it did not appear right that I should disregard such serious complaints against him, and so earnest an appeal to me, as the Agent of Government in immediate communication with the Sirdars, although those complaints relate to the acts of Ballajee Punt Nathoo when employed in the Sattara country; and I therefore, as a preliminary step, called on Krushnajee Sudasew to state the grounds on which he preferred these charges of extortion, fraud, and abuse of authority.

"3. The enclosure No. 2 (the List of Witnesses, and other evidence), is the answer he has brought me, in which he has introduced two additional charges against Ballajee Punt Nathoo, as well as matter relating to the Resident at Sattara; and I feel that I only perform my duty in laying both papers before the Honourable the Governor in Council.

"4. As, however, it would be most unjust to the Resident and Ballajee Punt Nathoo to allow Krushnajee Sudasew Bhidey to prefer these accusations without confirming such facts as are within his own knowledge, by legal solemn affirmation, and placing himself within the jurisdiction of a British Court, empowered to punish him for defamation; I have taken the solemn affirmation, of which the enclosure No. 3 is a translation, and obtained from him security to the amount of 1,000 rupees, besides his personal recognizance to the amount of 5,000 rupees, for his appearance at Poonah, till the inquiry which may be ordered shall have been completed.

"J. WARDEN."

What will be the surprise of this House when I say, that after all these formalities, precautions, and preparations, the Bombay Government dismissed the whole subject as utterly unworthy their attention, and took no means of rescuing the character of their own officer, or that of Ballajee Punt, by the only effectual and rational mode, namely, an inquiry into the case. Such being the state of the question, I trust this House and the Government will see the necessity of promoting an immediate and full investigation into all the facts of the case. I cannot but believe that the Rajah has been made the victim of the base and malicious plots of his native enemies, and that the Government, in refusing him the means of meeting the charges brought against him, have acted unjustly. Our character in India has, I feel persuaded, been much injured by the way in which we have disposed of this case; while, on the other hand, a solemn and sifting inquiry, which would enable the deposed Rajah to rebut the evidence given against him, and his restoration, in the event of his innocence being established, would more than anything else exalt our name among the princes and people of our vast Eastern Empire. I do not ask that the Rajah should be reinstated if he be guilty; but I do ask—and I will not at present believe that so reasonable a demand will be refused—that he be heard in his defence, and that, for the sake of truth and justice, the accusations which are contained in the Papers now before the House be impartially inquired into. The House of Commons will not, surely, be a party to the withholding of such an inquiry as is now prayed for. We have recently witnessed a severe scrutiny into the conduct of two Members of Her Majesty's Government, whose resignations have been accepted, in consequence of the strong sense entertained by the public of the necessity of having men in the public service who are beyond the reach of the slightest suspicion. I am quite convinced that there is not in this House a more honourable man than Captain Boldero, who is one of those whose resignations have been recently laid before Her Majesty, and accepted. Let it not, then, be said, that when charges so serious as those of bribery and corruption are preferred against officers in India, we refuse to examine the evidence offered in their support; and so at once prevent the refutation of them if they be false, and the punishment of the guilty if they be true. The Rajah has been condemned unheard, upon the testimony of the most worthless characters. Let us not, then, refuse inquiry into charges against our own public officers, when the means of ascertaining their truth are at hand, and when it is only by such a course that the ends of justice can be gained. The hon. Gentleman concluded by submitting the Motion he had announced at the commencement of his speech.

Dr. Bowring seconded the Motion, and said that it was deeply to be regretted, when subjects involving the well-being of our vast Indian Empire were introduced into the House, the interest taken was so small that the benches, as at present, were almost wholly deserted. Matters which had the piquancy of personal controversy were attractive enough; but those which directly affected the happiness of millions of our distant fellow subjects obtained little or no attention. In the case before the House, he found few hon. Members had waded through the numerous volumes of Papers which had been printed by orders of the House; but there was no portion of them which did not contain striking evidence of the widely-spread devices to entangle the Rajah; and on his part, a constant desire was everywhere visible to be confronted with his accusers, to court inquiry, and to demand a rigid scrutiny. On one side was confused, entangled, inconsistent, and contradictory evidence; on the other, an injured but highminded man, strong in his conviction of his own innocence, appealing to the Government of India, to the Government of England, and now to the British Parliament, for a fair investigation—demanding punishment if guilty, but redress and reparation if wrongly accused. And should the Rajah appeal in vain? It was impossible to read his eloquent and pathetic language without feeling that such a man, so speaking, was entitled to attention. With such evidence of mendacity, of fraud and forgery, as his hon. Friend had laid before the House, how could this case be permitted to remain in its present state? It would come back again and again—pressing and pleading with accumulated power. He entreated the House not to turn a deaf ear to the demands of justice and humanity.

Mr. E. Tennent said, the Motion to which the hon. Member had called the notice of the House, was one with which by name, at least, they might be somewhat familiar; inasmuch as this was, he believed, the eighteenth occasion on which it had been, either directly or incidentally, brought under the consideration of Parliament. The object of the hon. Member for Montrose was, to procure the reconsideration of a case which had been investigated in the year 1836, and solemnly disposed of with every ordinary and controlling formality; and the frequency of these unsuccessful appeals, if they exhibited on the one hand a perseverance which might be identified with a consciousness of the justice of their cause, demonstrated on the other a deliberation and firmness on the part of the numerous authorities who had been appealed to, concurring, as they all did, in rejecting the application, which could be attributable to one only conviction—that substantial justice had been already done, and that no plea existed for questioning the decision or reviving the inquiry. The inquiry into the charge against the ex-Rajah of Sattara, which had issued in his dethronement, was gravely and dispassionately conducted before a competent Commission in India; their verdict had been confirmed by authorities at Bombay, sanctioned by the Supreme Government of India, approved of by the Court of Directors, and recorded by the Board of Control; and although the propriety of reopening that inquiry had been referred to three successive Governors of Bombay, to three successive Governors General of India, to three Presidents of the India Board, and to a long series of Chairmen and Directors of the East India Company, the judgment upon it had been invariably the same—that the original decision was conformable with truth and consistent with justice; and that a reconsideration of a question so solemnly decided, would be not only unavailing as regarded the deposed Prince, but would be injurious to the administration of justice, and prejudicial to the authorities by whom it had been originally adjudicated. He (Mr. E. Tennent) would not allude to the general complexion of the evidence against the Rajah of Sattara further than to say that, the inquiry being one of a political character, and called for by political considerations, its conclusiveness was to be decided, not by the inapplicable technicalities of a nisi prius trial, but by that importance which, in the opinion of the Executive Goverument, attached to incidents and inferences involving the safety of a State and the security of a Government. In answer to the charge, that portions of that evidence had been given by individuals of infamous character, and that in the mass it presented discrepancies and doubts which, under other circumstances, would work the rejection of the entire case, he would merely remind the House, that this inquiry was pursued by parties upon the spot, to whom the characters of the witnesses were known, and the facts they deposed to were familiar; and that they, after every deduction for character, and every allowance for contradiction, came to the deliberate and retained conclusion that, after every exclusion and deduction, enough remained for conviction; and that the evidence, with all its differences, more than sustained the charges against the Rajah. The House should be aware that Sattara was no ancient dynasty, now overturned for our own aggrandizement; it was a small Principality, created by ourselves in 1819, and its Sovereign set up by us under a Treaty conformable to our interests. It was no discredit upon these proceedings to deny that the investigation was a trial; it was not a judicial trial; the British Government had no jurisdiction, no tribunal to try a foreign Prince. But it was a political inquiry, demanded in consequence of the equivocal conduct of a feudatory Prince towards his Lord paramount. That inquiry established the fact, that the subject of it had been guilty of practices at variance with the terms of the Treaty which was the tenure of his power; and, because he refused to renew that violated Treaty, with assurance of fidelity for the future, he was, as a last resource, removed from the throne, and the heir next in succession installed in his forfeited authority. The main allegation in the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose, and that most calculated to make an unfavourable impression on the public, was the assertion, that all knowledge of the evidence against him was withheld from the Rajah, and that to this hour he was in ignorance of the charge on which he had been condemned. Now, this was in every respect substantially incorrect. It was quite true, that of certain depositions no actual copies were submitted to him; and it was equally true, that the names of certain witnesses were withheld; but they were withheld upon this deliberate calculation—that, being subjects of his own, residing within his own dominions, and immediately within the circle of his influence, they would have been instantly tampered with, or constrained to withhold or to withdraw their testimony against him. But, whilst the names were withheld, the circumstances and facts of these allegations were all communicated to the Rajah, and the charges on which he was suspected were submitted for his answers and his evidence. Not only was this apparent in the pages of the Blue Books upon the Table, but they contained also the proofs that he tendered witnesses in his defence; and his own letters were filled with comments and explanations of the very charges on which he now complained that he was condemned in utter and total ignorance. The House would have collected from this and previous discussions, that the Rajah of Sattara was deposed on the grounds of a treasonable conspiracy to incite the western States of India to hostility against the British, and likewise of attempting to corrupt the fidelity of the native sepoys in the British service. His Minister, Govind Rao, was implicated and arrested for his share in these transactions; and his mother, Girjabaee, in the hope of saving her son's life by a confession of his complicity, caused a petition to be written, in which she indicated the names of twelve other individuals, all more or less involved in the guilt of the Rajah. Upon this information those parties were arrested, their offences proved, and their culpability extended to the inclusion of the Rajah. And the circumstances of this very petition, and of the equivocations and falsehoods in relation to it, were themselves a painful evidence of the difficulties attendant on such inquiries; and of the utter indifference to truth, and recklessness of assertion, which characterized even parties of the highest rank, who were implicated in this investigation. The author of the petition herself, the mother of the Minister, found it necessary by a falsehood to conceal the name of its actual writer, for fear of the consequence by which she might be visited by the Rajah. Her second son, a brother of the accused person, in like manner, in order to protect his mother from the Rajah's resentment, penned an elaborate and circumstantial denial of her connexion with the petition; while, at the same moment, the lady herself, in a personal interview with Colonel Ovans, avowed its authorship and authenticity, and assigned frankly her motives for its adoption. The hon. Member for Montrose might allege that at this interview, Girjabaee was personated by another lady: but her identity was proved by persons by whom she was accompanied, and by the fact that she had been previously a frequent visitor to the ladies of Colonel Ovans' family. This evidence of the authorship of this document it was essential to bear in mind; for, that point once established, it annihilated at one stroke the entire case which the hon. Member for Montrose had this evening set up. Krushnajee, the clerk who actually penned the petition for Girjabaee, was promised for his services 1,250 rupees. This promise the lady found herself unable to comply with; and the clerk, to enforce his claim, disclosed himself as the penman to the British Resident at Poonah. He prosecuted that demand against her with the utmost perseverance up to the death of Girjabaee, in April, 1843, when he suddenly shifted his ground, and protested to the Bombay Government that his first attempt to extort the money from Girjabaee was a fraud; that it was not she who had employed him to draw up the petition; but that the petition was from beginning to end a falsehood and a forgery, and that he had been suborned to draw up and transcribe it by Colonel Ovans, the Resident, and Ballajee Punt Nathoo, a distinguished officer of the reigning Rajah of Sattara; and that those two persons, after availing themselves of his services, now refused to pay him his reward, and still owed him 1,100 rupees out of the 1,250 which they had promised. Now, apart from the matchless effrontery of prosecuting, even to her death, an innocent lady, on a fraudulent pretence—let the House look at the probability or possibility of the device to which this shameless villain resorts. Supposing, for one moment that Colonel Ovans could have lent himself to so vile an imposture, and for so disgraceful a purpose; supposing that a man of wealth and distinction, like Ballajee Punt Nathoo, could have stooped to such a crime, was it to be conceived that the concoctors of such an artifice would run the risk, nay, incur the certainty of the detection, by withholding his wages from their instrument? In fact, there was and there could be no doubt that the mother of the Minister was the real petitioner in the case; that Krushnajee, the clerk, as a professional writer, was employed to draw up the document; and that whatever sum she might have promised as her fee, Colonel Ovans had not, and refused to have, the slightest concern with the transaction, or their mutual claims. Krushnajee having failed to induce the British Government to enforce the payment from Girjabaee, was equally unsuccessful in inducing them to believe his tale that their own representative and officer, Colonel Ovans, was his debtor, instead of the deceased lady; but, not to be baffled by one repulse, he announced his intention to persecute the Government with petitions, and the Resident with charges, till he should be appeased by the payment of his demands. Accordingly, petition followed petition, and allegation was heaped upon allegation, till at length, by one final sweep, he sought to crush both the objects of his animosity, and to his former charge against Ballajee Punt Nathoo and Colonel Ovans, he added those alluded to by the hon. Member for Montrose, of bribery, extortion, corruption, and dishonesty. And into these charges, brought by a man of such degraded character, and directed against one of the most upright and distinguished officers in the service of the East India Company, and one of the most eminent and honourable natives of India, the hon. Member now invited the House to enter, as a groundwork for demanding a revision and reconsideration of the whole inquiry into the political intrigues of the Sattara State. But the hon. Member said that the character of the informer had nothing to do with the nature of the charge, and that that character, bad as it might be now, was regarded as sufficiently respectable when, in 1837, they relied on it to prove the charges against the ex-Rajah of Sattara. He must deny the justice of that inference; he must deny that the evidence of 1837 had any connexion whatever with the character of Krushnajee. The personal evidence he gave on that occasion was not only voluntary, but was worthless; and not only was the petition which he wrote acted and decided on before he was even known as the author, and found true in all its allegations, but in reality it merely directed the Commission to the quarter in which they might seek for proofs without adducing a single proof or making one important statement on the face of itself. The worthlessness of the mere copyist's character was therefore totally unimportant; but were they prepared then, at the instigation of such an individual as this, to call in question for one moment the integrity and the honour of such a man as Colonel Ovans? And what was the character of Colonel Ovans? Sir G. Arthur, the Governor of Bombay, in noticing these charges, bore his testimony to the reputation of that distinguished officer in these terms:—

"Since my arrival in this presidency, it has been my duty, as opportunities have incidentally presented, to satisfy myself, as well by observation as personal inquiry, respecting the bearing and public reputation of all the Hon. Company's servants, especially of those holding offices of high trust and responsibility; and had I been called upon to name officers universally well spoken of and esteemed, I should certainly have included Colonel Ovans in the number; and this must have been the opinion formed by the late Commander-in-Chief, for on Sir R. Grant's requesting Lord Keane to name an able and judicious officer to hold the appointment of Resident at Sattara, he recommanded his Quartermaster General, Colonel Ovans."

Such was the man against whom this clerk preferred a charge of meanness and corruption. He (Mr. E. Tennent) held in his hand, and would beg to read to the House, two letters from Lieutenant Colonel Ovans, and he believed that every man who listened to them would feel a just indignation at finding a highminded and honourable gentleman placed in a situation requiring him to notice or contradict such humiliating calumnies. The first was addressed to his (Mr. E. Tennent's) noble Friend and Colleague at the India Board (Lord Jocelyn), and was as follows—it was received that morning:—

"London, July 22, 1845.

"My Lord—As I observe that a Motion is to be made this evening in the House of Commons by Mr. Hume—'That Her Majesty will be pleased further to direct inquiry to be made into the charges for bribery and corruption by Krushnajee Sudasew Bhidey (as stated in the Papers before this House) against Colonel Ovans, whilst resident at Sattara, I trust your Lordship will do me the favour to lay before Lord Ripon my unequivocal and unqualified denial of this atrocious charge; as also to state, that I am ready to proceed at once to India to prosecute this infamous libeller for perjury, should it be considered advisable so to do. Your Lordship may easily conceive that it is most painful to me to see such slander attached to my name; but I feel confident that an upright and honourable service of thirty-three years in India, will be my best reply to the base attacks now made upon me; arising as they do, from my having at Sattara, honestly and fearlessly performed an important public duty to the satisfaction of all my superiors both in India and in England.—I remain, &c.

"C. OVANS.

"P.S.—I venture to enclose a copy of a note addressed by me to the Secretary at the India House, putting on record these my sentiments regarding Mr. Hume's Motion."

The enclosure to the Secretary at the India House was as follows :—

"London, July 21, 1845.

"Sir—Observing in the Papers regarding the case of the ex-Rajah of Sattara, lately printed by the House of Commons, that Krushnajee Sudasew Bhidey has preferred the following charges against me—viz., first, that Lieutenant Colonel Ovans has obtained from his Highness the Rajah of Sattara, payment of the sum of 1,500 rupees per mensem to his (Lieutenant Colonel Ovans') father-in-law, and that this allowance was on his death transferred to the Resident's brother-in-law, who receives it up to this day; secondly, that when the Resident's lady and children proceeded to England, gold, bullion, and Venetian necklaces, to the value of 50,000 rupees, were purchased by the Rajah and given to the Resident; and observing also, by the Votes of the House of Commons of Friday last, that Mr. Hume has founded a Notice upon those charges, and mentioned me by name, I feel it to be my duty to state that, while I repose entire confidence in the Hon. Court to take whatever steps they may deem necessary in consequence of these charges, whether in justice to the public service or to me as an officer in their employ, I desire to place upon record my indignant and unqualified denial of all and every part of this most atrocious and calumnious accusation; and to state, that if the Court of Directors deem it right for me to proceed to Bombay, either to be subjected to the most rigorous investigation, or myself to prosecute the infamous author of this libel, I am prepared at every inconvenience, and at all hazards to my health, at once to adopt that course.—I remain, &c.,

"C. OVANS."

He hoped the House would concur with him that in these two letters there was a tone of frank and indignant honesty which was the most conclusive reply to the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose. The hon. Member for Montrose laid much stress upon the fact that the eighth petition of Krushnajee, the latest which had reached this country, was not inquired into by the Government of Bombay, although Mr. Warden, the agent of Sirdars and Sattara, had taken all the preliminary steps for an inquiry, and had bound over Krushnajee to prosecute, under a penalty of 6,000 rupees, and had obtained from him a list of witnesses to sustain the charge, including, among others, the name of the Dewan of the Rajah. The hon. Member attached much importance to the two facts of the petitioner having given these names and entered into this security. But as to handing in the name of the Minister of the Rajah as one of its witnesses, it appeared to have been but a piece of gratuitous audacity, in strict keeping with the reckless character of the charges themselves; and, as to the security, when the House was made aware that of these 6,000 rupees, the recognizance of the petitioner himself included 5,000, although he couched every petition in the character of a pauper, they would readily see that the amount of the security was no type of the character of Krushnajee. As for the remaining 1,000 rupees, even if forfeited, so small a sum as 100*l.* would be a trifling object to the partisan who bailed him, compared with the value of compassing the infliction of an injury on the reigning Rajah, his friends, or his case. As to the charges against Ballajee Punt Nathoo, Sir G. Arthur found that they were a mere repetition of the allegations formerly considered; and, with the unanimous concurrence of the Council of Bombay, he refused to entertain the petition. Sir G. Arthur and the Council also expressed their unanimous opinion that no credit could be attached to the accusations urged by Krushnajee against Lieutenant Colonel Ovans; and he trusted that the House would confirm this decision of the Governor of Bombay, and protect the character of a high-minded, honourable, and meritorious officer from aspersion or suspicion, by treating with contempt the imputations which it had been attempted to cast upon his name and conduct. He hoped, that the House concurring in this opinion, would give him (Mr. Tennent) its support in negativing the proposition of the hon. Member for Montrose.

Mr. W. Williams supported the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Board of Control (Mr. Tennent) had made many assertions, but he had not proved any facts. He (Mr. Williams) knew nothing whatever of Colonel Ovans; he might be, and probably was a highminded and honourable man; but so long as these charges were impending over him, and an investigation of their truth or falsehood was denied, his character could not be regarded as entirely free from suspicion. The most important charge made against the Rajah was, that he had entered into a conspiracy with the Portuguese Governor of Goa. Now, thi was a fact, the truth of which Her Majesty's Government might easily ascertain; but no proof had been adduced on the subject. He considered that it was the duty of the Government to institute some inquiry with reference to the allegations contained in this petition.

Mr. Hogg said, that when hon. Members made attacks upon the characters of gentlemen of high honour, who occupied distinguished stations in the service of their country, they should, at least, be certain that they were accurate in the facts on which they grounded their statements. Not so with the hon. Member for Montrose. He had so confounded dates, transactions, and witnesses, that he (Mr. Hogg) felt satisfied, that the hon. Member could not have read with any attention the Papers laid on the Table. The hon. Member had commenced by stating, that he would not enter into the details of the case of the Rajah of Sattara, and would confine himself to what he termed the new matter, the charges now for the first time preferred against Colonel Ovans and Ballajee Punt Nathoo; and yet he had rambled over the whole transactions, throwing out imputations most unsparingly, and giving a bit here, and a bit there, from the Papers, but in a manner so unconnected, that hon. Members who had not toiled through the mass of blue books, could understand little, save that imputations more or less grave had been cast upon many gentlemen filling high and important public offices. The House would suppose from the statement of the hon. Member, that the Rajah of Sattara had inherited the dominions of Sevajee, that the Peishwa had usurped his authority, and that the East India Company, after restoring him to his hereditary power and dominions, had entered into a Treaty with him as an independent Prince. Now this was wholly incorrect, and he would shortly state how the Rajah was circumstanced at the time when the Indian Government entered into a Treaty with him. The Mahratta power had been founded by Sevajee, a military adventurer, who raised himself to eminence in the time of Aurungzebe, and died in 1680. He was succeeded by two sons and a grandson; but his dynasty terminated about 1750, when the Peishwa, or chief of the Council of Brahmins, usurped the sovereign power, and transmitted it to six successors; the descendants of Sevajee remaining all the while, a period of nearly a hundred years, powerless and in captivity. During all this time the government was administered exclusively by and in the name of the Peishwa, who was universally regarded as the head of the Mahratta confederacy, and with whom all the Treaties entered into by our Government were concluded. Bajee Rao, the last of the Peishwas, having entered into a confederacy with other native princes for the overthrow of our power in India, the Government were compelled to take the field against him; and the result was the total overthrow of the Mahratta power, Bajee Rao himself having been taken prisoner. The object and policy of the Government was, totally to destroy the Mahratta power and confederacy, and all the territories of the Peishwa were accordingly annexed to the British dominions, with the exception of a new sovereignty which was created for the Rajah of Sattara, to enable him to maintain his family in adequate comfort and dignity. Thus, to use the words of Mr. Elphinstone—

> "The Rajah was released from a prison, and was placed at the head of a Government obtained by no effort of his own, but which was the spontaneous result of the liberality of the British Government."

But was this sovereignty given to him absolutely and without conditions? No such thing; he had the Treaty with him, and would, with the permission of the House, read it, or at least so much as related to the conditions annexed to the grant made to the Rajah. The Treaty bore date the 25th of September 1819:—

"Whereas the British Government having determined, in consideration of the antiquity of the House of his Highness the Rajah of Sattara, to invest him with a sovereignty sufficient for the maintenance of his family in comfort and dignity, the following Articles have been agreed to between the said Government and his Highness.

"ART. 1. The British Government agrees to cede in perpetual sovereignty to the Rajah of Sattara, his heirs and successors, the districts specified in the annexed schedule.

ART. 2. The Rajah, for himself, and for his heirs and successors, engages to hold the territory in subordinate co-operation with the British Government, and to be guided in all matters by the advice of the British Agent at His Highness's court.

"ART. 3. The British Government charges itself with the defence of the Rajah's territories, and engages to protect His Highness from all injury and aggression. The Rajah, for himself, and for his heirs and successors, engages to afford every facility for the purchase of supplies for such troops as may be stationed in his country, or may pass through it; and the pasture lands now appropriated for the use of the troops are to be permanently given up to them. The Rajah likewise, for himself, and for his heirs and successors, engages to afford all the assistance in his power to the British Government, in all wars and military operations in which they may be engaged.

"ART. 4. His Highness, for himself, and for his heirs and successors, engages at no time to increase or diminish the military force, without the previous knowledge and consent of the British Government.

"ART. 5. The Rajah, for himself, and for his heirs and successors, engages to forbear from all intercourse with Foreign Powers, and with all Sirdars, Jagheerdars, Chiefs, and Ministers, and all persons of whatever description, who are not by the above Articles rendered subject to His Highness's authority. With all the above persons, His Highness, for himself, and for his heirs and successors, engages to have no connexion or correspondence. Any affairs that may arise with them relating to His Highness, are to be exclusively conducted by the British Government. If (for the purpose of forming matrimonial connexions for His Highness's family, or for any similar purpose) His Highness has occasion to communicate with persons not rendered subject to his authority by this agreement, such communication is to made entirely through the Political Agent.

"This Article is a fundamental condition of the present agreement, and any departure from it, on the Rajah's part shall subject him to the loss of all the advantages he may gain by the said agreement."

The Rajah, it would be seen, was bound to be guided in all matters by the advice of the British Agent; was precluded from all intercourse with all persons not subject to his own authority, and could not even communicate as to matrimonial arrangements, except through the Political Agent; and this was what the hon. Member for Montrose called independence! The hon. Member had dwelt upon the exemplary conduct and good intentions of the Rajah, and had read in support of his statement various extracts from letters of Captain Grant Duff, General Briggs, and other Residents at his court. He (Mr. Hogg) contended, that the ambitious views and intriguing disposition of the Rajah were known to every person who had communication with him; to Mr. Elphinstone, who framed the Treaty, and to every Agent who resided at his court. In April, 1818, Mr. Elphinstone impressed upon Captain Grant Duff the necessity of preventing the Rajah having any intercourse whatever with any other State — and the stipulations in the Treaty sufficiently evince how strong the opinion of Mr. Elphinstone on this subject was. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Board of Control had read a letter from Captain Grant Duff, so early as March, 1819, showing that the Rajah was addicted to intrigue, and was a complete adept in dissimulation. General Briggs, when addressing the Government, states that he is tenacious of his prerogative, and is daily becoming more impatient of our control, and expresses his apprehension that he may be detected in intrigues which may lead to his ultimate ruin. General Robertson states, that he knew of the Goa intrigue; and General Lodwick, the fourth and last Political Agent, when addressing the Government on the 18th of August, 1836, says—

"That His Highness, the Rajah, is ambitious, and capable of giving countenance to any conspiracy that has the advancement of that object in view, I have no doubt. So far back as November, 1885, a devoted friend of the British Government privately reported to me, that the conversation between His Highness and his particular intimates constantly hinged on the downfall of the British Government. He further mentioned, that there were rumours of a combination, to join which His Highness was invited—adding, that he very possibly might be flattered into acceding to the plot. Nothing short of the high respectability of my informant could have induced me to give a moment's credit to their report."

Again, on the 9th of September, he says—

"That it was beyond doubt that the Rajah had proved faithless to his engagements with the British Government:"—

And on the 10th of September, he writes:—

"Deeply as I regret the errors of His Highness the Rajah, I can discover no extenuating circumstances:"—

And he subsequently reported to Government that the Rajah had gradually increased the troops in his service, and even suggested to Government the expediency of sending additional troops to Sattara; and, lastly, General Lodwick was so apprehensive of the consequences that might arise from the unauthorized communications of the Rajah, that he told him that the fate of Bajee Rao would be his own. Such were the opinions of these officers, when on the spot, and in the execution of their duty. He admitted, with the hon. Member, that they have subsequently expressed opinions of a different character, and most favourable to the Rajah; and he hoped he need not add, that he (Mr. Hogg) gave these gentlemen full credit for the sincerity of the opinions which they expressed; but he was bound to say, that he attached more weight to opinions given deliberately, under the pressure and responsibility of public duty, than to sentiments expressed when the case of the Rajah had become the subject of excited, and rather angry discussion. Before replying to the observations of the hon Member, as to the charges against the Rajah, he would ask permission to give a very brief sketch of the charges, and of the nature of the evidence adduced in support of them. In 1836, Colonel Lodwick apprized the Government that attempts had been made by the Rajah to corrupt the fidelity of our native troops, by tampering with certain native officers belonging to a regiment then stationed at Bombay. This was not stated by Colonel Lodwick as an idle rumour, entitled to little attention. It was a grave representation made by him in the discharge of his public duty, and it would appear, from his letters to Government on the occasion, that he then believed the charge to be well founded. In August, alluding to the officers who gave him the information, he says—

"The circumstances within my knowledge, detailed in the depositions of the native officers, admit of no doubt of their credibility."

And again, when forwarding the depositions to the Government, he says—

"They were taken separately; and full reliance may be placed on their correctness, both from the respectability of the deponents, and corroborating circumstances within my knowledge."

In consequence of this information, and not in consequence of an anonymous letter, as alleged by the hon. Member for Montrose—the Government appointed a Secret Commission to investigate the matter, composed of Colonel Lodwick, Mr. Willoughby, Political Secretary to the Government, and Colonel Ovans, then Quarter Master General; and this Commission, after a laborious inquiry, came unanimously to the conclusion that the charges against the Rajah were fully proved. And what was the nature of the charge thus proved? An attempt to corrupt the very life-blood of our Indian Empire. Before the Commission was issued, several persons at Sattara had been taken into custody at the suggestion of Colonel Lodwick, including Govind Rao, the Dewan of the Rajah. After the Commission had closed its proceedings, this person was sent as a kind of State prisoner, first to Poonah, and afterwards to Ahmednugger. About this time also, Girjabee, the mother of Govind Rao, actuated either by feelings of irritation against the Rajah for having surrendered her son, or by the hopes of obtaining her son's liberation, presented a petition to Government, stating the names of several persons implicated in these transactions. These persons were in consequence examined, and their testimony corroborated and confirmed the evidence taken under the Commission. But the strongest corroboration, arising from coincidence of evidence, was the statement of Govind Rao himself, who, at a distance of nearly 100 miles, and examined by a magistrate wholly unconnected with the matter, confirms by his testimony the evidence given at Sattara. The importance of this evidence was felt by the adherents of the Rajah, and how did they meet it? By alleging that Govind Rao was confined in a dark dungeon at the peril of his life, and that the statement was extorted from him by Mr. Hutt, the magistrate of the district. Now what were the facts as appears by Mr. Hutt's letter to Government? That he ordered a separate House to be taken for Govind Rao, who was treated with every consideration, and that Govind Rao himself volunteered the statement which was taken in Mr. Hutt's own house, Govind Rao writing it in Mahratta, while Mr. Hutt took it in English. He would now notice the objections urged by the hon. Member for Montrose to the proceedings under the Commission. The hon. Member alleged, that the Rajah had not been furnished with a copy of the evidence, or a list of the witnesses, and that he was refused permission to bring with him an adviser. It was true that the Commission was a secret one; but he (Mr. Hogg) contended that everything was conceded to the Rajah that was requisite for his information, or for the means of defence. After the witnesses had been examined, and a primâ facie case had been established, the Rajah was invited to attend the Commission. He was requested, or to use the words of the Commission, he was—

"Earnestly pressed to allow the evidences, who were in attendance, to be introduced, that he might hear their history from their own lips."

But he peremptorily declined being confronted with the witnesses, as derogatory to his dignity. The evidence of the principal witnesses was read over to him; whatever he had to say, or suggest, was attended to; several written memoranda were received from him and recorded, and all the witnesses whom he chose to name were examined. He was told that he might be accompanied, if he wished, by any friend, and he was, in fact, accompanied by his brother and Balah Sahib Senaputtee. He had wished to be attended by a barrister of the Supreme Court at Bombay, which the Commissioners most properly refused, and this was the grievance on which so much stress had been laid. The hon. Member had alleged, that the witnesses adduced were wholly unworthy of credit, and that the charge had been fabricated, for his own purposes, by Bellajee Punt Nathoo; and he read an extract from a speech or letter of General Lodwick, reflecting severely on Ballajee Punt Nathoo, and representing him as hostile to the Rajah, and designating him as an arch informer. Now, he (Mr. Hogg) would confidently state, that he did not believe there was any native in India of higher character and integrity, or more deserving of credit, than Ballajee Punt Nathoo. Mr. Elphinstone states that Ballajee Punt Nathoo had been connected with the Poonah Residency from the year 1804, that he entered the Residency employment in 1816; and to use his own words, he says—

"In the troubles that followed, and in the settlement of the country, he (Ballajee Punt Nathoo) showed himself an able, zealous, and trustworthy public servant. He was my principal native agent, during most of the time I was in the Deccan, was consulted by me on all subjects, and gave me every reason to be satisfied with his judgment and fidelity."

When Ballajee Punt Nathoo was produced, and examined before the Commission, his name, at the suggestion of Colonel Lodwick, was not recorded. Did Mr. Willoughby and Colonel Ovans neglect to inquire as to the character of a person produced under such circumstances? No such thing. They placed Colonel Lodwick himself in the witness box, and the following was the result. He was asked—

"Are you intimately acquainted with the person whose evidence was taken at the last day's meeting, whose name has not been recorded?"

His answer was:—

"I have been intimate with him since I have been at Sattara, whenever he visits the place; and from his extremely high character, and influence over the Rajah, I have been enabled to carry points and settle disputes which I should have hardly been able to effect without him."

Question.—"From your knowledge of his character, have you full confidence in his veracity?"

Answer.—"Yes, I have, as far as in any native in India I have ever known. His former intimacy with, and the confidence reposed in him by, most eminent men now in England, are the best proof of his high character."

Question—"Do you think it likely that he is so much in the interest of Appa Sahib, the Rajah's brother, as to induce him to deviate from the truth?"

Answer—"No, I do not."

He had said that Colonel Lodwick, Mr. Willoughby, and Colonel Ovans were unanimous in declaring that the Rajah had been proved guilty of an attempt to corrupt our native sepoys. Sir R. Grant, the Governor of Bombay, and all the Members of his Council, after perusing the evidence, came to the same conclusion. Lord Auckland, the Governor-General of India, and all the Members of Council, with the exception of Mr. Shakespear, were equally satisfied as to the

Rajah's guilt. Sir Robert Grant, though fully satisfied of the guilt of the Rajah, took a lenient view, and suggested some very trifling punishment; the Government of India regarded the matter as deserving much more serious notice, and Mr. Shakespear himself admitted, that if his doubts as to the evidence were removed, the punishment ought to be of the severest character. And here, let it be observed, that when Mr. Shakespear expressed his doubts, he had only read the evidence taken by the Commission at Sattara, and that he died before that evidence had been supported and fortified by subsequent inquiries. Shortly after the Report of the Commission, Colonel Lodwick was removed from the Residency of Sattara, and Colonel Ovans was appointed in his place. By him the investigation was continued, and in the course of that inquiry he discovered the first traces of the intrigues and correspondence with the Government of Goa, and the ex-Rajah of Nagpore. The evidence, oral and documentary, as to the Rajah's intercourse with the authorities at Goa, for the purpose of subverting our authority, was so voluminous and complex, that it would be impossible to attempt even a sketch of it. He admitted fully the folly and absurdity of the scheme; but he at the same time contended, that the charge was proved and substantiated beyond the possibility of a doubt. It had been urged, that the charge respecting Goa was a conspiracy, got up for the purpose of completing the ruin of the Rajah. How, he would ask, was that allegation consistent with the fact that General Robertson left the Residency in the year 1831, admitted that he had heard of the Goa intrigue when he was at Sattara, and had represented to the Rajah, that the prosecution of it would involve him in difficulty, and probably be the ruin of the Raj? If it were a conspiracy, he must say, that the conspirators gave themselves a vast deal of unnecessary trouble, and exposed themselves to much unnecessary risk of detection, by adducing no less than forty witnesses. But, independently of the evidence of witnesses and documents, there was corroborative testimony of a very remarkable character. Mr. Spooner, the Collector of the District of Rutnagherry, received secret information of an intended attack upon the Treasury at Vingorla, and in consequence of that information instituted an inquiry. Here was an inquiry, at a remote station, by a magistrate wholly unconnected with Sattara, and for a wholly different purpose, and yet, in the course of that investigation, evidence was taken, strongly confirming and corroborating that given at Sattara, relative to the Goa intrigue. The hon. Member had ridiculed the absurdity of the Goa intrigue, and had expressed his astonishment that the Government could have wasted their time in inquiring into such a matter. He fully admitted the absurdity of the scheme; but he denied that the wisdom or the folly of the Rajah's intrigues, formed any element in the consideration of the matter. Or, to use the words of Sir Robert Grant—

> "To play at treason is a dangerous sport; and I am much inclined to believe, that a State which consents to laugh at such jests as these, will quickly be in a situation to justify the utmost derision of its enemies."

The last charge, that of corresponding with Appa Sahib, the ex-Rajah of Nagpore, was also most fully proved. And what, he would ask, was the conduct of the Rajah, when the letter addressed to him by Appa Sahib was produced and shown to him by Sir James Carnac? Did he indignantly repudiate the charge, or deny the authenticity of the letter? No such thing—he evaded any direct answer, by alleging that the receipt of letters did not constitute guilt on the part of those who received them; and by asking, where are my answers? The hon. Member for Montrose endeavoured to create the impression, that the Bombay authorities were hostile to the Rajah, while the Supreme Government and the Court of Directors disregarded the charges, and disapproved of the investigation. A very unfair impression might be created by reading part of a despatch or a minute without stating the time or circumstances when it was written. It was true, that the Governor General expressed his apprehension as to the danger of becoming involved in an indefinite and inconclusive inquiry; and further expressed his apprehension, that the inquiries might create feelings of mistrust and insecurity throughout India. Previously, however, to the receipt of this communication, the Government of Bombay had obtained the clue to the whole intrigue; and, without troubling the House by further reference to the correspondence that took place pending the inquiry, he would confidently state, that no one could peruse that correspondence without feeling satisfied that no Indian authority had any hostile feeling towards the Rajah, or any intention or wish to depose him; and that nothing but a clear conviction of the Rajah's guilt, and an imperative sense of public duty, could have induced them to adopt harsh measures. When the whole of the inquiry had been terminated, all the authorities were clearly satisfied as to his guilt; but, there was much discussion, and, at first, some little diversity of opinion, as to the best mode of proceeding, in consequence of that guilt. At this time Sir Robert Grant died, and was succeeded in the government of Bombay by Sir James Carnac, who was invested with full powers to determine the best course, and to bring the matter to a speedy conclusion. Sir James Carnac had been in the chair at the India House, and it was a matter of notoriety that his views and opinions were favourable to the Rajah of Sattara. Sir James Carnac arrived in Bombay in June, 1839, and, in several minutes, took a review of the case, concluding by strongly expressing his opinion in favour of a mild and lenient course of proceeding. He suggested that a strong remonstrance should be addressed to the Rajah, stating, that the Indian Government considered it proved that he had entered into irregular and unwarranted communications with the Goa authorities, and with Appa Sahib, the ex-Rajah of Nagpore, and had attempted to seduce from their allegiance native officers in the service of the British Government. That, nevertheless, the British Government were willing to throw oblivion over all that had passed, upon his renewing and scrupulously adhering to the former Treaty, and undertaking not to injure the persons or families of those who had taken part in the proceedings against him. Subsequently to this proposal, Sir James Carnac received a despatch from the Governor General, enclosing copies of the minutes of the Council of India, who were unanimously of opinion that the charges against the Rajah had been fully proved, and had subjected him to the penalty of deposition. The receipt of that despatch, and the strong opinions expressed by the Governor General and his Council, made no alteration in the sentiments of Sir James Carnac, who still adhered to the lenient course he had suggested; though he distinctly recorded his opinion, that upon a reconsideration of the evidence and inspection of the original documents, and his own observations since his arrival, there was not a shadow of doubt in his mind as to the guilt of the Rajah, on the three charges preferred against him. Sir James Carnac having obtained the sanction and approbation of the Government of India, proceeded himself to Sattara for the purpose of carrying into execution his own lenient and merciful suggestion. He had four several interviews with the Rajah, and no one could read his narrative of the transaction, without being forcibly struck by the anxious solicitude evinced by him to retain the Rajah in his position, and save him from impending ruin. After addressing him in the most conciliatory language, he put into his hands a Mahratta paper, which the Rajah was required to sign, and the translation of which he would read to the House:—

"Information having been received by the British Government, that your Highness, misled by evil advisers, had, in breach of the Treaty which placed you on the throne, entered into communications hostile to the British Government, an inquiry into these accusations was considered indispensable. This inquiry has satisfied the British Government, that your Highness has exposed yourself to the sacrifice of its alliance and protection. Nevertheless, moved by considerations of clemency towards your Highness and your family, the British Government has resolved entirely to overlook what has past, on the following conditions, namely:—

"First,—That your Highness now binds yourself strictly, and in good faith, to act up literally to all the Articles of the Treaty of the 25th of September, 1819, and especially to the Second Article of that Treaty, which is as follows:—The Rajah, for himself, and for his heirs and successors, engages to hold the territory in subordinate co-operation with the British Government, and to be guided in all matters by the advice of the British Agent at his Highness's Court.

"Second,—That your Highness binds yourself to pay your brother Appa Sahib Maharaj, whatever allowances he has heretofore received, and to put him in possession of all his private property; and, should any dispute arise on this subject, the same is to be referred to the Resident, for adjustment. Appa Sahib Maharaj is also to be permitted to reside at any place he himself may choose, under the protection of the British Government.

"Third,—That Bulwunt Row Chitnavees be dismissed from your Highness's counsels, and not permitted to reside within your Highness's territory without the sanction of the British Government.

"Fourth,—The persons whose names are inserted in a separate list having been guaranteed by the British Government in person, property, and allowances of every description, as the same stood in July, 1836, this guarantee is to be binding on your Highness, and all complaints against them are to be referred to the Resident. Should it appear necessary hereafter, to the British Government, to add the names of any other persons to this list, the same guarantee is to be extended to them, and it is to be acted upon in good faith by your Highness, in any manner that may be pointed out by the British Government. All complaints against these persons are also to be referred to the British Resident for his adjustment.

"The above are the terms to be agreed to by your Highness, and these conditions are to be considered as supplemental to the Treaty of the 25th September, 1819, and to be signed and sealed as such, by your Highness; that there can be no modification in these terms, as your Highness's sincere well-wisher, the British Government offers them in the confidence that your Highness's penetration will recognize their moderation, and the expediency of a prompt acquiescence. It is confidently expected, also, that the clemency of the British Government in preserving your State (raj) will be duly appreciated by your Highness, as it cannot fail to be by the general voice of this country, and induce your Highness, for the future, scrupulously to maintain the relations of friendship and mutual confidence, by acting up to the provisions and principles of the Treaty."

Now, let it be observed, that the Rajah was not called upon to enter into any new terms—he was merely required to observe strictly, and in good faith, the Treaty that he had already entered into; and this he peremptorily refused to agree to, or sign, alleging that he had three several times refused to sign the original Treaty. Sir James Carnac distinctly states, that it was to this, the first of the conditions in the paper, that the Rajah expressed the greatest objection, stating, that by signing it, he would reduce himself to the condition of a Mamlutdar, or farmer of the district. The hon. Member has stated, that the Rajah was called upon to admit his guilt, and that he, therefore, refused to sign the conditions proposed to him. It is true, that the preamble states, that the British Government were satisfied as to the guilt of the Rajah; but he himself was not called upon for any explicit admission of his guilt. It was indispensably necessary to assign some reason in the preamble, for the renewal of the former Treaty, and the introduction of the other conditions in the proposed Paper; and he (Mr. Hogg) did not see how the preamble could have been rendered less offensive. Besides, Sir James Carnac distinctly states, that the objection of the Rajah was not to the preamble. He particularly requested him to point out the particular part of the terms which he objected to, and in reply the Rajah distinctly refused to sign any new agreement whatsoever. Sir James Carnac says, towards the conclusion of his last Minute—

"His conversation with me and his past conduct have satisfied me, that he is a man whom no Treaty can bind, and that he is firmly resolved not to re-enter into and fulfil the stipulations of the Treaty under which he was enthroned."

He attributes his failure to the inflated and erroneous impressions which had been instilled into the Rajah's mind; and, above all, to the confidence he reposed in the numerous agencies he had established in India and in England. He (Mr. Hogg) could not state too strongly his own opinion, that such agents, whether native or European, were the bane of every native Power that employed them. Sir James Carnac having tried in vain, during four interviews, to induce the Rajah to accede to his proposal, and avoid the ruin that must await his refusal, was compelled most reluctantly to determine on deposing him, and placing his brother in his stead. Still, however, he was unwilling to carry this severe sentence into immediate execution; and on leaving Sattara, instructed the Political Agent to send after him any communications which he might receive from the Rajah, hoping still to save the infatuated Prince. He (Mr. Hogg) would confidently ask the House, if it was consistent with our character, and our safety, in India, to pass over, without notice, the attempt of a native Prince, however limited his power, to subvert the British authority; and he would further ask whether it was possible to suggest a course more lenient than that proposed by Sir James Carnac? The suggestion was entirely his own, and opposed to the opinions of the other authorities in India; and every feeling that could influence a public man must have combined to make him use every effort for the success of his own proposal. The hon.

Member for Montrose had asked, with regard to the Goa intrigue, whether any reference on the subject had been made to the Portuguese Government? Why did not the hon. Member tell the House that he himself had written to the nobleman who at that time was Governor at Goa? And what was the answer of the Governor? Not that he had no correspondence or communication with the Rajah of Sattara; but that he had no correspondence relating to political matters. What right, he would ask, had the Rajah of Sattara to communicate at all with the Portuguese Governor, or with any foreign authority whatsoever? He was expressly prohibited from having any communication with any foreign authority; and the forfeiture of his dominion was declared to be the penalty annexed to the violation of that condition. Before leaving this part of the subject, he would ask permission to read two extracts from a minute recorded by the late Mr. Edmonstone, one of the ablest and most benevolent men that ever adorned the British service in India; one known to be ever foremost in maintaining the rights and privileges of native Princes; and, in political experience and knowledge, scarcely inferior even to Mr. Elphinstone.

"The Principality of Sattara had no existence antecedently to the formation of the Treaty with the Rajah. By the subversion of the Peishwa's power, his territorial possessions, of which the territories now composing the State of Sattara formed a part, together with all the rights of sovereignty and supremacy which he exercised, devolved upon us. The Mahratta Federative Compact was dissolved: the nominal supremacy of the imprisoned descendant of Sevajee was virtually extinguished; the materials which formerly constituted the Mahratta Empire were dissipated. The full extent of the Rajah's claim upon the justice, and even the liberality of the British Government, might have been satisfied by a stipend or a jagheer; its policy awarded to him a dominion, under special restrictions however, having specifically for its object to guard against the assumption of that titular supremacy to which he still considered himself to possess an hereditary claim.

* * * * * * *

"Finally, I must maintain, that in political questions involving the rights, interests, and conduct of its allies and dependants, the ruling power is the sole and proper judge; and that, in the case now under consideration, the British Government was not required to put the Rajah on his trial, and to be governed by the issue of it; but was strictly justified in deciding, on the ground of recorded and indisputed facts, that by his conduct he had incurred the forfeiture of his dominion, and that it was placed under the absolute necessity of carrying that decision into effect on his refusing to accede to the terms of a new Treaty, which, although it necessarily involved either a direct or inferential acknowledgment of his misconduct, yet only required him in future to abide by the principles of his original agreement, the conditions of which he had failed to observe."

There might be some diversity of opinion as to the mode of conducting the different investigations, and as to the policy of scanning too minutely every violation of political faith by subordinate native Princes; but the main and substantial question before the House was the guilt of the Rajah; and he solemnly declared, he could not understand how any one who had perused the Papers could entertain a doubt as to his guilt, or the justice of the punishment inflicted. He now came to the charges of personal corruption against Colonel Ovans and Ballajee Punt Nathoo; and he must first express his deep regret that an hon. Member who took such a deep interest in the affairs of India, and was well acquainted with the character of its civil and military servants, should have felt it his duty to bring forward such a charge proceeding from such a source. The House would bear in mind, that when calling their attention to the proceedings under the Commission, he had stated that Geerja Baee, the mother of Govind Rao, had presented a petition to Government, giving the names of several persons implicated in the matter then under investigation, and able to afford important information. There was some difficulty in ascertaining the person who had been employed by Geerja Baee to write that petition. At length, Krushnajee Sudasew voluntarily came forward, and stated to Colonel Ovans that he had written the petition by the desire of Geerja Baee; and, to remove all doubt as to the truth of his allegation, he produced a duplicate of that petition, the original having never been out of the possession of Colonel Ovans, thereby proving most satisfactorily that he, Krushnajee, had written and prepared the petition. In December, 1842, this Krushnajee presented a petition to Government, stating that Geerja Baee had promised him 1,250 rupees as payment for his trouble in writing her petition; that of this sum he had only received 150 rupees; and praying the intervention of Government for the recovery of the balance. He further alleged that Colonel Ovans and Ballajee Punt Nathoo had made themselves responsible for the sum promised by Geerja Baee. This petition was referred by Government to the Resident at Sattara, Colonel Ovans, who reported that he knew nothing whatever regarding the alleged promise of 1,250 rupees by Geerja Baee; that Krushnajee, if he had any claim on Geerja Baee, must proceed against her in the usual manner; and that Government could not interfere in the matter; and a reply to that effect was sent to Krushnajee. Shortly before the receipt of that reply, he had presented a second petition, nearly to the same effect as his first; and, in reply to that petition, he was informed that his allegations had already been considered, and that the decision communicated to him must be regarded as final. He then presented a third petition to the Governor, when on a tour in the Deccan, charging Ballajee Punt Nathoo with having received bribes from the Jageerdars and Ryots. This petition was inquired into, the allegations were declared to be utterly unfounded, and Krushnajee was informed that no further petitions on the subject would be received from him. Notwithstanding this intimation, he presented three or four other petitions to a similar effect, which, by the order of Government, were returned to him. Finding that his petitions presented to Government were returned, he thought he would try his success in another quarter; and he accordingly presented a petition to Mr. Warden, the agent for Sirdars at Poonah, dated October, 1843, reiterating his charges against Ballajee Punt Nathoo, and alleging, as before, that the petition of Geerja Baee had been written by him at her desire, and complaining that the promised reward of 1,250 rupees had not been paid to him. He would beg the attention of the House to this, that Krushnajee, in all his petitions up to October, 1843, alleged that the petition of Geerja Baee had been written by him and by her desire. This man, Krushnajee, now comes forward and declares, that all his former complaints and allegations regarding Geerja Baee were false; that she never employed him to write any petition; and that the petition purporting to have been presented by her, was forged by him at the suggestion of Ballajee Punt Nathoo, who had withheld from him the wages of his iniquity. This wretch forges a petition in the name of Geerja Baee, and then endeavours to extort from the unfortunnate woman payment for having forged a document tending to the injury both of herself and son. He (Mr. Hogg) believed that the annals of human depravity scarcely contained another instance of such infamy—admitted and avowed by the man himself—and yet it was upon the unsupported assertion of this wretch, that the hon. Member for Montrose had thought it his duty to place upon the Votes of this House, charges of bribery and corruption against a British officer of high honour and unblemished reputation. It so happened, that as regarded the case of the Rajah of Sattara, it was entirely immaterial whether the petition of Geerja Baee was authentic or not. That petition stated no facts—it only indicated the names of various persons who could afford information, and these persons were in consequence examined, and did afford important information. Therefore, although the petition was in itself an important document, its authenticity was wholly immaterial. There could not, however, be a doubt that the petition was prepared by the desire of Geerja Baee, and written by Krushnajee. Geerja Baee had called upon Colonel Ovans, and had adverted to and admitted the petition. It had been alleged that Geerja Baee had never called upon Colonel Ovans, but had been personated by some woman, employed for that purpose by Ballajee Punt Nathoo. To this Colonel Ovans had replied, that Geerja Baee had called to visit his wife, that her person was known to him, and that he could not have been deceived. He would add, that Geerja Baee died in April, 1843, and that these allegations were not made until after her death. It was true, that documents had been transmitted to the Court of Directors by the hon. Member for Montrose, showing that Geerja Baee had disclaimed all knowledge of the petition in her name; but his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Board of Control had read to the House a document of a subsequent date, in which Geerja Baee alleged that the supposed denial was extorted from her. He had already stated that Ballajee Punt Nathoo was a native of great influence, and of the highest character and respectability, and had been rewarded by the British Government for the valuable services he had rendered: that he had been connected with the British Government in India for nearly half a century; and he had read extracts from documents, showing the high estimation in which Ballajee Punt Nathoo was held by Mr. Elphinstone and all the public authorities who succeded him. This man had given useful information to Government in the Sattara affair, and had, therefore, been persecuted ever since with a most inveterate and implacable malignity. The charges preferred against him had again and again been declared false and malicious by the proper authorities in India; and this last attempt was now made here, to endeavour to disgrace, by foul charges, the name of a man now on the confines of the grave. The charges against Colonel Ovans were, that he had obtained payment of the Rajah of the sum of 1,500 rupees per month to his father-in-law, and that this allowance was, on his death, transferred to his brother-in-law, who received it up to this day; and that when Colonel Ovans's lady and children proceeded to England, gold bullion, and Venetian necklaces, to the value of 50,000 rupees, were purchased by the Rajah, and given to the Resident. These charges were not even adverted to in the letter from Krushnajee to the Court of Directors in December, 1843. For upwards of five years, every attempt has been made to cast imputations upon the judgment and impartiality of Colonel Ovans—but it was not (as Sir George Arthur says) until the eleventh hour, that his calumniators had dared to cast an imputation upon his integrity and honour. These charges were preferred before Mr. Warden, the agent for Sirdars, who made no inquiry whatever into them; he merely took the usual sureties, and referred the matter for the orders of the Government. The Government, finding that the charges preferred against Ballajee Punt Nathoo were identical with those which had so often been declared false and malicious, dismissed them without further notice or inquiry. He was happy to say, that with regard to the charges against Colonel Ovans, no inquiry was made by the Bombay Government. Knowing the high honour and unblemished character of that distinguished public officer, and the infamous source from whence the charges proceeded, the charges were spurned with contempt by the Bombay Government, as they were by the Court of Directors, and as he hoped they would be by the British House of Commons. Sir George Arthur states, in his minute, that he had the fullest opportunities of knowing the bearing and reputation of the public servants in his presidency, and he declared that he would name Colonel Ovans among those who stood highest in the public respect and estmation. Sir Thomas M'Mahon, the Commander in Chief, did not deem the charges deserving even of notice, and satisfies himself by saying that they ought to be dismissed without inquiry. He would ask permission to read an extract from the minute of Mr. Crawford, who had known Colonel Ovans from the time of his arrival in India. Mr. Crawford says—

"I have known Colonel Ovans personally, from his first arrival in India (I think, as far back as the year 1808, or thereabouts) to the present time; and I may add, intimately, throughout that period. For although circumstances prevented our meeting in later time for a considerable number of years, I never lost sight of him, or of the estimation in which he was held by all classes. Of his pecuniary transactions, I had also an opportunity of knowing much in former days: and, certainly, his disregard of all selfish considerations, untainted, however, by any approach to extravagance, would point him out to me as amongst the last men in the service who would be guilty of corruption, or dishonourable dealing in any way. In fact, to sum up my opinion of Colonel Ovans in a very few words, I believe him to be utterly incapable of the acts imputed to him by this petitioner, or of any act as a public servant, or private individual, that need be concealed from any one. With these sentiments, I would deal with this, as all former petitions from the same source, dismiss it at once."

He would also ask permission to read a short extract from the minute of Mr. Reid, the third and only other Member of Council:—

"The character and reputation of honourable men, who have well and zealously served the State, must not be left at the mercy of worthless and irresponsible individuals, who, urged by disappointment, or by some more unworthy motive, or employed as the mere tools of a faction, step forward as public accusers."

And in conclusion he says—

"Taking this view, I consider it quite unnecessary to make any remarks on the case before us, further than to express my regret that an officer of Colonel Ovans's established character should be liable to be traduced by such a person as Bhire appears to be. But, this is an evil to which all public men are exposed, and especially those who, in doing their duty, place themselves in opposition to the interests of influential and unscrupulous adversaries."

He felt that an apology would be necessary, both to Colonel Ovans and to the House, if he were to enter into an argument to show the absurdity, as well as the falsehood, of these charges. It had been stated by his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Board of Control, that neither Colonel Ovans's father-in-law, or brother-in-law, had ever been in India. It appeared further, that the receipt of the alleged pension of 1,500 rupees was stated to have been of long standing, and as Colonel Ovans's family went home in April 1843, the receipt of the gold bullion and necklaces was also a transaction not of recent date. How came it, then, that these matters had never before been adverted to? It was pretty obvious, that the adherents and advocates of the Rajah were not very scrupulous, and yet neither in petition, nor in debate at the India House, where the matter had been so often and so warmly discussed, was there ever even an allusion to any such charges. The last debate at the India House was only about six weeks ago, and no allusion whatever was there made to the subject, though Colonel Ovans was personally assailed, and the hon. Member for Montrose had expressed his surprise that he had not thought himself called on to attend and defend himself. He (Mr. Hogg) thought, that the course pursued by Colonel Ovans was the course that ought to be pursued by any man of high honour and conscious integrity, under such circumstances; and he would ask permission to read to the House a letter addressed by Colonel Ovans to Mr. Melvill, the Secretary to the Court, a few days previous to the debate referred to:—

"1, Charles Street, Lowndes Square, 14th June, 1845.

"My dear Mr. Melvill—I should not have considered it necessary to have made any observations on the proceedings at the last Quarterly General Court of Proprietors, held at the India House on the 19th of March last, had it not struck me that I might be expected to appear in person to defend my conduct, as a public officer, from the accusations brought forward by Mr. G. Thompson. But, as I think, such a course of proceeding would be generally condemned, and, moreover, would be highly injurious to the public service, I trust, you will oblige me by submitting the following points to the Chairman and Deputy Chairman on the subject:—

"These points are — 1st, That as the Sattara case has been duly disposed of by the Government of India, the Court of Directors, and the Board of Control, it does not become me, as a public servant, to interfere.

"2nd, That my conduct as regards the case having been approved of by the Court of Directors, I feel confident I may safely trust my defence in their hands.

"3rd, That I, therefore, rest assured, that whatever discussion may hereafter arise, the Court will do me the justice to believe, that it is from no apprehension or unwillingness to meet any charge that may be made against me that I refrain from attending personally in that Court, but solely from a strong sense of public duty; inasmuch as it appears to me, that it would be very prejudicial to the public interests for officers, who had held high political employment in India, to attend in that Court to answer charges affecting not only their own acts, but those of their official superiors, both in India and in England.

"As regards this case, therefore, I will only add, that I am ready and willing to afford any explanation that may be called for by the Court of Directors. But that, as I before said, I conceive it would be very hurtful to the public service to admit (by attending personally in the Court of Proprietors) the right of Mr. G. Thompson to examine and try the servants of the East India Company for acts done in their official capacity whilst serving in India.—I remain, &c.

"C. OVANS."

The hon. Member had said, if Colonel Ovans is conscious of his own innocence, why does he not court inquiry, which could only end in the refutation of the charges? He (Mr. Hogg) contended that the mere institution of an inquiry into the truth of charges so foul and infamous, would be a stigma upon the character of any man. By whom were these charges preferred? By a wretch who, at the very moment he preferred them, avowed himself guilty of forgery, perjury, and extortion: character would indeed be valueless, if it did not protect a public servant of tried ability and unblemished reputation, from such charges proceeding from such a source. He urged these considerations even more strongly, with regard to Ballajee Punt Nathoo. It might be matter of feeling, or perhaps he ought rather to say of prejudice. But he appealed to all who had been in India, as to the correctness of what he said, when he stated, that among natives of high caste, character, and influence, the disgrace of inquiry is little less than that of conviction. No failure, no exposure, could add to the infamy of Krushnajee; while his malignity would be gratified, if he could throw a shade time to do it in such a manner as should save the credit of those who had pledged themselves to his guilt; and hence it was that he (Sir E. Colebrooke) believed that the new Governor had recourse to that extraordinary expedient that had been alluded to in debate, of offering terms of amnesty to the Rajah, on condition of his subscribing a Treaty which should contain a full confession of his guilt. He understood that the hon. Member for Beverley denied that the Treaty contained such an admission; and yet it stood recorded on the preamble and on every part of the document. Even the very fact of renewing the old Treaty was only intelligible on the supposition that the former Treaty was broken or at an end. But not merely that; Sir J. Carnac, in his address to the Rajah, when he offered him these terms, reports that he made him a long speech on the subject of his criminality and ingratitude, and wound up with a parade of the magnanimity of the Government in offering terms of grace. He would read the Rajah's reply, as given by Sir J. Carnac, and the House would then judge whether the hon. Member for Beverley was justified in saying that the Rajah's refusal of the terms did not turn upon the point of his confession of guilt.

"During my address, (are the words of Sir J. Carnac,) the Rajah evinced a considerable degree of impatience, and frequently interrupted me by abrupt declarations that he had committed no breach of alliance. When I had concluded, he stated that he regarded me as his friend and well-wisher, asserted that the accusations against him originated in the intrigues of his enemies; that as long as the British Government entertained the idea that he had cherished hostile designs, he could agree to nothing; but this idea being removed, he would agree to any thing I proposed; that he would consent to any thing except to abandon his religion, or to acknowledge that he had been our enemy."

He (Sir E. Colebrooke) considered the Rajah's reply dictated by proper pride and conscious innocence. He refused to accept the dishonourable terms offered to him, and he was accordingly dethroned. Having said thus much in favour of the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose, he regretted having, in some measure, to qualify his approbation. But he could not agree to that part of the Motion which impugned the conduct of the Government, in refusing to enter upon the accusations against Colonel Ovans, as detailed in the petition of Krushnajee Sudasew Bhidey. He thought, upon reading the Papers laid before Parliament, that the Government had come to a proper decision upon that subject; and he was the more disposed to make this admission, because he did not think that the Rajah's case was materially improved before the House, by entering upon the points detailed in those petitions. He thought the case weakened by entering into such details; the House was an unfit tribunal to enter upon such questions of evidence; but they were fully qualified to judge whether the proceedings towards the Rajah had been marked by fair dealing, and whether they were conducted with regard to substantial justice. It was in this point of view that he had submitted his observations to the House. He thought that the whole proceedings towards this unfortunate prince were reprehensible, and having a strong opinion on the subject, he could not allow this opportunity to pass by without stating them to the House.

Mr. Wakley said, it appeared to him that upon all questions of personal grievance the Government seemed to make it a rule to get rid of the complaint by a large majority, and thus the responsibility of the Executive Government was removed from it by the decision of the House. He thought that this was rather an appeal to the Government than to the House. The First Lord of the Treasury ought to make himself perfect master of the case, and bring it to a satisfactory conclusion. For his own part, he knew little or nothing of it until he heard it discussed in the House that night; and having listened patiently to the statements that had been made on both sides of the House, he had come to the conclusion that the Rajah of Sattara was a most injured man, and that the least that could be done was to institute an inquiry. Should the prayer of the Rajah's petition be withheld, it would be a most serious reflection upon the Government. The hon. Member for Beverley had failed to prove what he attempted. Commenting upon the evidence taken at Sattara, the hon. Member opposite had said that the witnesses were most reckless persons, that they utterly disregarded the truth, and that they had no apprehension of consequences, their names being concealed.

Yet upon that evidence the Rajah had been deposed and banished, and was at the present moment an exile at Benares, and doomed to remain so, unless that House or the First Lord of the Treasury would interfere. Would the House refuse inquiry? Did they not feel that they were dealing with the case of an innocent man? Nothing could prove his innocence more than his pertinacious refusal to sign a document confessing his guilt, with all the awful consequences of that refusal staring him in the face. Why, Sir J. Carnac would have permitted the Rajah to remain on the throne, to exercise royal authority, and to remain in connexion with the British Government, had he signed that document? That was proof demonstrative that Sir J. Carnac believed him to be an innocent man. Could Sir J. Carnac believe that he was dealing with a traitor? If he did, he himself would be liable to impeachment for the course he attempted to take.

Mr. Bingham Baring was induced to make a few observations on what had fallen from the hon. Member for Taunton (Sir T. E. Colebrooke). The hon. Member had drawn an analogy between the inquiry which had been made into the case of the Rajah of Sattara, and that which had been made into the case of a feudal chieftain in the North-West Provinces, who had been guilty of the murder of Mr. Fraser; but it was impossible to adapt the same mode of proceeding to the judicial trial of a subject for the crime of murder, and to the investigation of the political conduct of a dependent Sovereign to whom a breach of Treaty was alone imputed. Much blame had been cast upon Sir Robert Grant's conduct in this case; but the circumstances of India at the time had been altogether overlooked. The right hon. Member for Edinburgh told us, in a debate upon the Affghan war, that there prevailed about that period a general impression throughout the whole Empire, that the epoch of British dominion had reached its term. The star of England was considered to be upon the wane, and the advent of a mysterious power from the North-West was expected to overwhelm us. Upon the same occasion, the authority of General Cubbon, Governor of Mysore, and of Colonel Sutherland, Governor of Rajpootana, were quoted, to show that there never had existed such a ferment among the native princes of India. We know, moreover, that the Rajah of Kinnoul had collected munitions of war in the castles of his Principality, sufficient for the outfit of a large army, and that an insurrection had broken forth lately at Hyderabad. These were the circumstances under which Sir Robert Grant acted; he would not otherwise have noticed intrigues, contemptible in themselves, and of common occurrence at all times in the proceedings of native courts. The inquiry he had to institute was conducted by our Resident in a foreign State, among the subjects of the accused monarch. It was, from its very nature, beset with imperfections, which rendered its result unsatisfactory as a foundation whereon to act. It was in consideration of these imperfections that the Home Government, although satisfied of the guilt of the Rajah, determined to overlook it. They selected as the new Governor of Bombay the Chairman of the Court of Directors, who had shown himself favourable to the accused monarch. He determined, on his arrival in India, to undertake, in person, the negotiation, which was a necessary preliminary to the restoration of the Rajah to his Throne. His subjects had committed themselves by giving evidence before our Commission. We were bound to protect them from persecution. His brother had been implicated. It was necessary to secure to him his estates and pension. The Rajah had for many years refused to comply with the Second Article of the Treaty, which had placed him upon the Throne, and had pledged him to conform, in all things, to the advice of the British Resident. It became necessary, therefore, as a guarantee for the future, to insist upon again recognising the Treaty of which he had been entirely forgetful. These were the three conditions contained in the Mahratta memorandum which he was called upon to sign. He positively refused. The hon. Member for Taunton says that the plea of his refusal was, that he was thereby called upon to acknowledge his guilt. This plea was not advanced by the Rajah at the time: it was an afterthought, suggested by his European advisers. The allegation of guilt contained in the preamble of the memorandum presented for his signature, was an allegation of the belief of the British Government in his guilt; but he was not required to sign the preamble. Sir James Carnac himself assured him (Mr. Baring), that he should most readily have met such an objection by cancelling the preamble, which was altogether needless for the purpose he had in view, which purpose appears upon the face of the documents to have been to obtain the guarantee of the Rajah, for the future observance of the Treaty, for the amnesty of the acts of the witnesses, for the payment of his brother's pension. Look at Sir James Carnac's declaration, written before he quitted Bombay. Look at Mr. Farish's minute approving of the deposal of the Rajah, in which he wrote at the time—

"2. My entire conviction of the Rajah's guilt in the instances charged against him is on record; subsequent events have only tended to confirm it; but the very act of his refusing the conditions of oblivion and reconciliation—conditions which even spared him the mortification of expressly acknowledging guilt, particularly the first, as connected with his remark that it would place him in a subordinate situation, is a virtual declaration that he did not hold himself bound by the Treaty of 1819; and, even setting aside his former infractions of the Treaty, shows that no dependence could have been placed on him at any future period."

Look at the evidence of the Rajah himself, contained in his own recital of events, communicated by him to the Nizam—a document which contains nothing upon which accusation might be rested—a document which bears every stamp of authenticity. He there says—

"5. 'The whole substance of the new memorandum (yad) is this, that nothing is to be done without consulting the Resident. Then I am to be like a Mamlutdar only, and to be subject to continual annoyance, and to have my people wearied, and entirely to let the statements of my enemies be confirmed.' I would not sign it, in consequence, although the Resident brought me the memorandum, and left it to them to make what arrangements they thought proper, on making reference to (the authorities) in Europe and Calcutta, for when requisite I shall speak in presence of those gentlemen who were present, whatever I have to say."

It was thus shown by the evidence of Sir James Carnac, of Mr. Farish, of the Rajah himself, that he was dethroned, not for his violation of the Treaty, but because he refused to give us those guarantees for the future which his previous conduct had entitled us to demand. So much with regard to that part of the speech of the hon. Member for Taunton. As for the rest, he rejoiced to find that the hon. Member for Taunton did not concur with the hon. Member for Montrose, in giving credence to the accusation against Colonel Ovans, and Balajee Punt Nathoo, a native of high rank and character, a constant friend of the British Government, and a confidential adviser of Mr. Elphinstone, in his settlement of the claims of the Southern Mahratta Jaghiredars. He would not go further into that part of the case, which had been so ably treated by others; but he could not refrain from expressing his indignation that upon the evidence of so worthless a character, after the perusal of the complete justification presented in the Papers before the House, charges of such a nature should be reiterated against men of such high and unblemished character.

Mr. Hume, in his reply, was understood to say that he would confine himself chiefly to one point. The hon. Member for Beverley had defended Colonel Ovans, and found fault with him for his observations on that officer. In reply to the hon. Member, he would beg leave to read to the House an extract of a statement he had previously submitted to the Earl of Ripon. In that he said—

"In a letter from Captain Durack to Colonel Ovans, dated 27th September, 1837, and forwarded by that officer to the Bombay Government, it is stated that Colonel Ovans authorized the writer (Captain Durack) to pay a sum of money to an obscure subject (Bhaw Lilly) of the Sattara State, for Papers that would implicate his Sovereign; and it appears that the sum of 150 rupees was actually paid in advance.

"By his letter to the Bombay Government, dated the 11th November, 1837, par. pa. 403, Colonel Ovans reports that he has obtained Papers from one Balkoba Kelkur (a gang robber) for 400 rupees (40*l.*) most important against the Rajah. These Papers consisted of letters, alleged to be from the Portuguese Viceroy of Goa to the Rajah, (which the Viceroy, now in Lisbon, has deposed to be foul forgeries,) and seals (which are proved not to be the Rajah's) with other documents, not one of which is proved to be genuine. Yet, will it be credited, that on the 21st September, 1842, Colonel Ovans makes an affidavit, in defiance of these recorded facts, that he never, directly or indirectly, purchased evidence of any witness or witnesses whatever; and although Colonel Ovans (now in England) has been publicly accused of moral, if not legal perjury, by the Rajah's agent, now in England, he has not availed himself of the usual facilities for clearing his character of imputations which the most obscure individual would consider an everlasting stigma upon his respectability and good name."

For everything there stated he had vouchers in the Papers on the Table of the House, and he put it to the House, whether the contradiction between Colonel Ovans's statement on November 11th, 1837, and his statement on September 21st, 1842, was not a complete vindication of what he had stated to the House, and a complete refutation of the hon. Member for Beverley's remarks? But he held in his hand other Papers, which confirmed all that he had advanced. He had the letters of Captain Durack to Colonel Ovans; he had a translation of the receipt for 150 rupees for the service which Bhaw Lilly agreed to perform. He had the copy of the forged seals of the Rajah, which were purchased by Colonel Ovans, and produced by him as evidence against the Rajah. He had copies too of the real seals which were produced by Rungo Bapojee, in proof of the forgery of those purchased by Colonel Ovans. All these, he contended, were clear and distinct proofs that Colonel Ovans was aware that evidence had been suborned against the Rajah, and that it was on this suborned evidence his proceedings were founded. He would not then go further with the case, nor would he press his Motion to a division. He had done his duty in bringing the subject under the notice of the House, and he threw on the Members the responsibility of rejecting his Motion, and neglecting to do justice to an injured Prince. He would only warn them that the preservation of our Empire in India must in the end depend on securing the affections of the natives, and that to pursue towards their princes a career of injustice, was to endanger our Indian Empire. If Ministers took no steps in the matter, he would bring the subject again before the House early next Session.

Question put, and negatived.

BUTTER AND CHEESE.] Mr. Ewart rose to move that the House go into a Committee to consider the Duties of Customs on Butter and Cheese. He was of opinion that these duties should be totally repealed; in the first place, because they placed well nigh a prohibition on the consumption, by the poorer classes, of articles of the greatest importance to them; in the second place, because they operated as a great restriction upon our trade and commerce; in the third place, because their repeal, so far from injuring the revenue, would increase it; and, in the fourth place, because, when they were imposed originally, it was with no intention of their being permanent, the object of their being imposed, at the close of the war, being to give an impulse to the sale of Irish produce. As to the poorer classes, these duties had the effect of doubling for them the price of these essential articles. As to our trade, their repeal would infallibly extend our commerce with Holland 50 per cent., and that with the United States from 75 to 100 per cent.; this extension, moreover, especially applying to those States with which our relations required to be established on a greater and more friendly footing. Experience had fully shown, in the case of coffee, tea, and other articles, that a reduction of duty was sure to produce a more than equal amount of revenue from the greater consumption of the articles, while in every other respect the results were clearly most beneficial. His proposition, doubtless, would be resisted by agricultural Members; yet their constituents were deeply interested in the repeal of these duties, so large a proportion of what butter and cheese they did manage to get being of foreign produce, and the price of this being, as he had said, doubled to them in consequence of the Tariff. He would not trouble the House further at present, but simply move that the House go into Committee.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he should certainly confine himself, as the hon. Member had anticipated, to the financial bearings of the subject. The hon. Member had intimated that if they went into Committee, he should move the total repeal of these duties; to that Motion he should offer a decided opposition. He need scarcely remind the hon. Gentleman or the House, that the financial arrangements for the year had been made. In making those arrangements, the Government had endeavoured to give the most relief to the interests of the country. Some there were who thought they had gone beyond prudence; but that they had gone to the extreme verge of prudence was the opinion of all, for they had proposed such a reduction of duties, that when the calculations of revenue and of expenditure for the year were made, they proposed to leave at the end of the year a surplus not exceeding 100,000*l*. It was his duty, therefore, not to yield to any further reductions, which could not be made without the risk of a considerable deficiency. The two duties on butter and cheese produced last year a sum of 347,000*l.*, which he could not consent to give up, neither could he consent to state now what course he would pursue for the future. It was the duty of a financial Minister not to express a premature opinion, which expression might be made use of and operate injuriously. It would be fatal to those who were engaged in business if a course of future policy were promulgated at the end of a Session which would derange the trade of the country, whilst there might be circumstances in the country afterwards which would prevent the promised repeal. On the propriety, however, of these, as of all other duties, he would reserve his opinion till that period of the year when the finances were to be considered; and when he knew the circumstances of the country at the time, he would take such a course as would best promote the general interests of the country.

Mr. M. Gibson admitted that the right hon. Gentleman ought not to be expected to announce on the part of the Government what reduction of duties they would propose, and what would be their fiscal policy for the future. He was glad, however, to find the right hon. Gentleman justifying these duties only on fiscal grounds, and declare that the only benefit the country received from these duties was 347,000*l.* It had been proved that the present duties cause a considerable reduction of human food, and that if there were no importation the agricultural labourers would not be able to procure cheese or butter. Knowing something of the agricultural labourers of Suffolk, he could say they consumed a great deal of the inferior kinds of foreign cheese. He knew that the cheese of Suffolk was hardly eatable, and, as it was said, the dogs barked at it, and he thought a duty of 100 per cent. was too high to be maintained, if they put on any duty at all. The cheese growers of this country could not supply one-half the wants of the country. The duty on corn here had a tendency to increase the arable and to destroy the pasture land, whilst they maintained this high duty on cheese and butter. The end of the war was of all times the most strange for increasing taxation, and he called upon the Government at the earliest period to take a course which he had every confidence they would take, and consider these duties which affected most important interests in the country.

Mr. Hume thought, it could be shown that the Revenue would receive the same amount of money, and the duty be reduced at the same time. Every reduction of duty on other articles had increased the Revenue; and if these duties were reduced one-half, the same sum might be received, and a great benefit conferred.

Mr. P. Howard said, that in Warwickshire, Cheshire, and some other counties, where a large quantity of cheese was made, the farmer would suffer materially if that branch of agricultural produce were much interfered with. After the concession which the Government had made to the commercial interest at the commencement of the session, he thought it was hardly fair to make any fresh demand. The agriculturists ought not to be deprived of all protection.

Mr. Newdegate would only make a single observation. It was to express a hope that though the agricultural Members might be silent on the present occasion, the House would not suppose them to be indifferent to the subject under consideration.

Mr. Cobden feared if some of his hon. Friends near him supported a scale of duties for such articles, it would be necessary for him to dissolve partnership with them. It would, he was convinced, be found that any duty on articles of food would fall doubly as heavy on the labouring man as on the rich man, and thus the Government would be in a dilemma, in which they should abolish the duties altogether. Though the hon. Members for Derbyshire, and some other counties, might find it to be for the interest of their constituents to support the duties on butter and cheese, he could not see why the Members for Norfolk and Suffolk, for instance, should adopt the same course. If the right hon. Baronet would take the trouble of making inquiries on the subject, he would find that there were six or eight counties taxing the rest of the country, as well as all Ireland and Scotland, in order that they might receive a high price for their cheese. In the same manner, if the right hon. Baronet took up other articles, such as oats, beans, hops, and barley, which were produced in particular districts, he would be able to checkmate every county in the kingdom. He would be thus able to show that they were pursuing a system by which they were picking each other's pockets, and by which they were all losers in their turn, while the whole country was a loser along with them. With regard to the question before the House, he felt confident that it would be dealt with next year, if not in the present Session; and he hoped that other heavily taxed articles—such as silk, which had been alluded to in the course of the present debate—would be taken into consideration at the same time.

Mr. Tatton Egerton said, the hon. Member who had just sat down had talked of the agriculturists picking one another's pockets, but he had said nothing about the great manufacturers of Lancashire or Yorkshire adopting the same course in picking the pockets of all England. He did not, however, reproach the manufacturers for making large fortunes; but he would ask, why were not the landed proprietors to have also a return for their capital? If the profits of the two classes, namely, the agriculturists and the manufacturers, were compared together, he was convinced that the latter would be found to be beyond all comparison the greater.

Dr. Bowring said, if the manufacturers of this country required the consumers to pay a higher price than the same article could be procured for elsewhere, then, indeed, the comparison drawn by the hon. Member who had last spoken would hold good. But the manufacturers had repeatedly declared that they required no protection, and they even showed that those manufactures which had been most protected had progressed least.

Sir Robert Peel had been rather curious to know what Motion the hon. Member would have made, provided he succeeded in inducing the House to go into Committee. In the early part of the Session, when the hon. Member before brought the subject forward, he had been under the impression that the object of the hon. Member was to move for an absolute and total repeal of these duties; but now, when his right hon. Friend had argued that the Motion of the hon. Gentleman involved a loss of 350,000*l.* to the revenue, the hon. Member cried out "no, no," as it implied only a reduction of the duty. But how was it to be expected that Her Majesty's Government could seriously consider a reduction of 350,000*l.* in the Revenue at the present period of the Session? At an earlier part of the year, when they found themselves, in consequence of the renewal of the Income Tax, with a considerable surplus to deal with, they proceeded to propose reductions in the duties on various articles to the amount of 3,400,000*l.* Now, it would have been perfectly open to any hon. Gentleman, when these reductions were under consideration, to have proposed the remission of some of these duties, in order to substitute others for them; but, instead of doing so, hon. Gentlemen approved of the various reductions that had been proposed by the Government, and now, after having permitted them to be carried into effect, and after the Government had reduced their estimated surplus revenue to 100,000*l.* for the year, the hon. Gentleman comes forward in the month of July and proposes a farther reduction of 350,000*l.*, for some time, at least, in the taxation of the country. The Government had already left the surplus revenue much smaller than under ordinary circumstances would be desirable; but they wished to make a great financial experiment, and they therefore ventured as far as they possibly could go. Again, if the present Motion were carried, another hon. Member (Mr. Foster) intended proposing another Resolution, which involved an additional reduction of no less than 80,000*l.* He would ask, did the House think it right to annihilate the small sum that would remain in the hands of Government, and to run the risk of having a deficiency of 200,000*l.* or 300,000*l.* at the end of the present year? He opposed this Motion wholly on financial grounds, and he thought it decidedly objectionable to permit the propositions of Her Majesty's Government with regard to finance to be confirmed at the proper period of the Session, and that each individual Member should be at liberty to make propositions involving large financial changes. If the House had not confidence in the Government, whose business it was to bring forward a proposition of finance for the year, let a Motion of want of confidence be made. He said that the Government was bound, at the proper period of the year, to make an exposition of their financial scheme for the year, and then it was for the House to adopt or reject it; but to take the course adopted by the hon. Member opposite, of bringing forward a financial proposition of this nature late in the Session, must derange the commercial policy of the country, and render it altogether uncertain what line would be pursued. He trusted the House would not accede to the Motion.

Colonel Sibthorp said, he for one had not confidence in the Government. The right hon. Baronet asked, why not bring forward a Motion of want of confidence? If such a Motion were made, the right hon. Baronet would probably find himself having recourse to the other side of the House to help him through.

Mr. M. J. O'Connell wished his hon. Friend would not press his Motion to a division; but at the same time, if he did so, he (Mr. O'Connell) would feel it his duty to vote with him. His constituents depended more on the sale of butter, than even on corn; but still he thought one rule should be applied to all agricultural produce; and in proof of the little danger which was to be apprehended from foreign competition, he might refer to the flax-growers of Ulster, who, though at first alarmed at the reduction of the duty on flax, now produced a larger quantity of that article than they had ever done before.

Mr. Ewart replied: he begged to remind the right hon. Baronet, that it was in consequence of the right hon. Baronet's suggestion he had postponed his Motion on a former occasion. He wished, also to add, that when he spoke of a reduction in these duties, it was from a conviction, that if the rates of duty were reduced one-half on butter and cheese, the gross amount received by the Revenue would fully equal that now arising from these sources.

The House divided:—Ayes 38; Noes 136: Majority 98.

CUSTOMS DUTIES.] Mr. Forster then moved, that the House resolve itself into Committee, for the purpose of considering the propriety of repealing the duty on a great number of articles, such as quinine, torrified starch, horses, mares, colts, &c. He would not, at that late hour, trouble the House by going into the particulars of all these items; but he thought, considering the small amount of duty received from them, that they ought to have been included in the general Tariff; and he hoped the right hon. Baronet would give some satisfactory reason for their omission.

Sir R. Peel said, when he had brought forward his reduced Tariff, he did not state that there were not other articles on which a reduction of duty ought not also to be made; but, considering the progress that the Government had made during the past three years in commercial reform, he thought the House might very well leave further alterations in their hands for future consideration.

Motion withdrawn.

FEES IN CRIMINAL COURTS.] Mr. Escott, in moving the Second Reading of Fees in Criminal Courts Bill, said, persons brought up to a court of justice had certain fees to pay if they were not convicted; and those who were found guilty, had frequently to pay more than ten times the amount of the fine imposed on them in the shape of fees. Interests had sprung up from these fees to defend this system. There were those now living, who remembered when the office of clerk of assize was sold for several thousand pounds, and by a Judge of assize. He trusted that the Bill would be read a second time. If, in preparing its provisions, he had gone too far in any particular, that might be considered in Committee. They could not possibly stop short as regarded the great principle involved in the measure.

The Attorney General observed, that the House should take care that they were not hurried into rash legislation as to this matter. To a certain extent, he entirely agreed with the hon. and learned Member. The hon. and learned Gentleman was induced to take up the subject, by reason of great abuses which existed in the county with which he himself was more intimately connected. These abuses principally consisted in exacting fees from persons before they were allowed to plead, in taking fees from parties who were acquitted, and in compelling persons to traverse, and so obtaining fees from them. He entirely agreed with the hon. and learned Member, that these were great abuses, and that they should also be remedied; and he was quite prepared to introduce any measure which might have the effect of remedying them. But his hon. and learned Friend had been led too far by his own strong feelings. In the Bill which he had introduced, the House would at once perceive that the principal object was to abolish all fees, in all cases whatsoever, whether of acquittal or conviction; and, whether on trial or indictment, or upon more summary proceedings. By the 55th George III., the fees on acquittal, taken from prisoners, tried either for felony or misdemeanor, were entirely abolished. That Act did not certainly go to the extent for which his hon. and learned Friend properly contended, because it only applied to the case when the parties were in prison, and charged with felonies or misdemeanors, and afterwards acquitted. It was a great evil, that parties out on bail, charged with misdemeanor, and afterwards acquitted, should be made to pay fees on that acquittal. He thought that no parties should be called upon to pay fees, before they were admitted to plead. Nor should any party be compelled to traverse, for the purpose of giving fees to the officer; but he was not disposed to say, if a person was disposed to traverse, that all fees on traverses should be abolished. He agreed, that with regard to acquittals, no fee should be taken from a party, whether he were discharged out of prison, or out on bail, and tried for misdemeanor and acquitted. He concurred with the principle so far, as that it was improper to demand fees before parties were permitted to plead; that was a grievance, and that he would remedy; and to that extent he went with his hon. and learned Friend. His hon. Friend had said, there were cases in which the fees on conviction were more than the fines imposed by way of punishment. That, he admitted, was also a grievance which should not be continued. Provide a remedy for these cases; but as the Bill now stood, extensive and general as it was, he must oppose it.

Mr. Aglionby approved of the principle of the Bill, and was glad the subject had fallen into such hands. The object was to remove a grievance which pressed severely on many of Her Majesty's subjects; and, if the Bill went too far, and repealed Acts of Parliament, some of which the Attorney General admitted should not remain on the Statute Book, he thought they had a right to expect from the hon. and learned Attorney General a statement of what particular Acts of Parliament he was willing to extend the operation of the Bill to. He would suggest that the Bill should be allowed to be read a second time; and, that in the mean time the Attorney General should consider to what Acts of Parliament the Bill should extend.

Sir J. Graham had understood, that the object of the hon. Member was merely to abolish fees charged upon the acquittal of parties, of fees exacted from persons admitted to bail, and from persons forced to plead. To that extent, as he had stated last year, he was prepared to go with his hon. Friend; but this Bill went further, and proposed to repeal some Acts of Parliament under which fees were imposed under other circumstances, to its full extent, therefore he could not concur in it. Being prepared to support the object of his hon. Friend so far as he had said, he should vote for the second reading of the Bill, upon the understanding that it would be modified in Committee.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. By Mr. Morison, from Provost, Magistrates, and Town Council, of Inverness, complaining of Delay of Edinburgh Mail.—By Mr. Escott, from William Hollis, late a Lieutenant in the 36th Regiment of Madras Native Infantry, for Inquiry into his Case.—By Mr. Bannerman, from Insch, for Diminishing the Number of Public Houses.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

PROHIBITION OF SMOKE.] Mr. Mackinnon brought up the Report of the Committee on the Smoke Prohibition Bill.

On the Motion that the Amendments made by the Committee on the Bill, be now read a second time,

Mr. Ward objected to the Bill, that it would be found impracticable to carry out many of the clauses. There were some trades and manufactures entirely exempted from its operation, and unless he were permitted to introduce some clauses to exempt the manufacturers and workers in Britannia metal, he should be obliged to move that the Report be taken into consideration that day three months.

Mr. Mackinnon could not give his consent to any further alterations in the Bill.

Mr. Beckett Denison said, that he had received many letters from Yorkshire, requesting him to oppose that part of the Bill which enacted, that the inspectors created by it, should be paid out of the county rate, and the expense be thus saddled on the agriculturists.

Mr. Hawes objected to the Bill, because the hon. Member for Lymington, since the Bill had gone through the first Committee, had introduced so many exceptions, that they were more than the rule, and by that means it exempted the stronger and oppressed the weak, and upon that principle he would oppose the Bill.

Mr. C. P. Villiers complained, that the hon. Member for Lambeth, after sitting on the Committee, and hearing the evidence on the part of the ironfounders and ironmasters, stayed away when the Report was drawn up, in order that he might oppose the Report when brought under the consideration of the House.

Sir W. Clay contended, that the sugar refiners ought to be exempted from the operation of the Bill. If the Bill had remained general, he would have supported it with pleasure; but as exceptions had been made, he thought the sugar refiners had a right to be exempted also.

Mr. Muntz said, that it was a mere question of expense. If the sugar refiners were exempted, he should feel compelled to move, that he himself, and all other parties following the same trade, should likewise be exempted. He contended that there should be no exceptions at all.

Mr. W. Williams supported the Bill. The object of the hon. Member for Lymington, in introducing this Bill, was to protect the industrious population of this country from a very great nuisance.

Mr. B. Escott thought the hon. Member for Lymington was not treated fairly by the opponents of the Bill, because he had excepted some interests from the Bill.

Mr. Wakley recommended that the hon. Member for Lymington should give up his Bill altogether; and as the question affected the lives of the whole community, he should throw the responsibility of bringing in a Bill of the like nature upon the Government.

Mr. Duncan agreed with what had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. Wakley), that this was a question of far too great magnitude to be in the hands of any one Member of that House, however able or however willing to bring foward a measure of this nature —and no one was more ready to offer his tribute of thanks to the hon. Member for the trouble he had taken in maturing this Bill; but he begged to ask the hon. Member if he intended this Bill to extend to Scotland? If he did, it would be found to be altogether inapplicable to that country; for the very first clause authorized the inspectors to be paid out of borough rates, settled as the justices in special sessions, shall from time to time think fit. Now, in Scotland, no special sessions exist. To Clause 3, and many others, objection would be made, if the hon. Gentleman was determined to go on with the Bill. But he would strongly urge on the hon. Member to allow the whole subject to be taken up by Government, and by this means a measure might be got with which parties might be satisfied; whereas the present Bill would not, and could not, satisfy the country. The district which he (Mr. Duncan) represented, was one where a great number of flax mills would come under this Bill. At present a great desire existed among his constituents to carry out the objects of this Bill; but no fixed mode of doing so had yet been pointed out, although his Friends in Dundee had expended large sums in making experiments on the subject; and at this moment the Commissioners of Police had nominated a Committee for this very purpose. Under all the circumstances of the case, he earnestly hoped Government would step in and take the matter into their hands, as they alone were able and ought to grapple with a national question of this vast importance.

Mr. Mackinnon replied. He hoped that the House would permit the Bill to be tried as an experiment as it now stood; and if it succeeded with all the exceptions, it might be made to extend generally to all manufactures.

Amendment withdrawn.

Amendments of the Committee agreed to.

Sir C. Lemon, in the absence of Mr. Godson, moved the addition of the following clause:—

"Provided always, and be it further Enacted, That nothing in this Act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any steam or fire engines used or employed in or about any mines, collieries, iron works, copper works, or spelter works, or for the purposes of winning and working, making, burning, calcining, or manufacturing of iron, copper, spelter, and iron-stone, respectively, anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding."

Clause read a first time.

On the Question that it be read a second time,

Mr. Hawes said, he should feel it his duty to divide the House on every exemption mentioned in the Bill.

The House divided:—Ayes 20; Noes 43: Majority 23.

Lord John Russell thought the exceptions made by the hon. Member for Lymington were so unjust, that he could not support the Bill. He would recommend that further inquiries should be made, by Commission or otherwise, into the necessity existing for any exceptions at all. They had as yet arrived at no sstisfactory conclusion; but by next Session, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Lymington would have the satisfaction of knowing that he had been a great benefactor to the country.

Sir James Graham was most anxious to adopt the suggestions of the noble Lord, and, on the part of the Government would undertake that during the recess scientific inquiries should take place into the safety of extending the Bill to stationary steam engines; and on the House meeting next Session, the result should be made known, and, whether favourable to the exceptions or not, the reasons for that opinion should also be made known. His noble Friend the First Commissioner of Woods and Forests intended shortly to lay before the House a large and comprehensive measure on the health of towns, into which Bill the measures considered to be necessary from the report of the scientific inquiry, could be incorporated, or, into a separate and, he hoped, much more satisfactory measure.

Mr. Mackinnon hoped that a pledge would be given by the Government to introduce the measure early next Session.

Further consideration of the Report put off for three months.

LUNATICS.] The further proceedings on the third reading of this Bill were resumed. Amendments made, and Bill passed.

PRIVILEGE.] Mr. F. French said, he should not detain the House more than two or three minutes, whilst he addressed to it a few observations which he felt it necessary to make. He had seen in the public papers a report to the effect that a breach of the privileges of that House had been committed in regard of a speech being published in the Times newspaper of yesterday morning which had been attributed to him, and which had been declared to have been incorrectly attributed to him; in point of fact, that he never made such a speech at all. Now, he dared say that there were many Members then present who could bear him out in stating that every single word in the report of the speech alluded to had been uttered by him in that House. He stood beside the noble Lord the Member for London on that occasion, and on the Ministerial bench were the Prime Minister and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department; and he believed that those Gentlemen, as well as every one who had been within hearing when he addressed the House, could vouch for the fact that the report was literally and wholly correct. He came into the House on the occasion to which he referred without any idea of speaking; but an opportunity appearing likely to occur of addressing himself to a particular subject, he made a short note, which he had still in his possession, and which he compared with his speech as reported in the paper alluded to, and that note bore out the full and literal accuracy of the report to the very letter. Now, a reply had come to that speech from a powerful quarter, and he admitted it was perfectly true that long practice had given to the individual who made that reply a power of wielding his weapons with greater dexterity than he could command; but, nevertheless, he had yet to learn that, if the occasion required it, he could not strike as hard a blow as that individual. He had neither courted that individual nor did he fear him; but, at the same time, it was not his intention to carry on with him a war of abusive words, which was neither consonant with his own feelings, nor consistent with his position in that House. As an allusion had been made in a report in the public papers to a company with which he was connected, he trusted the House would give him its attention for a few minutes, whilst he stated the facts relating to his connexion with that company. The House was probably aware that he had for many years taken an interest in the construction of railways in Ireland, and that he had opposed a plan which was suggested by his noble Friend Lord Morpeth, when Secretary for Ireland, for the construction of railways principally in the south of Ireland; the view which he then took, and which he took still, being that a line to the west of Ireland would tend more to the interest of the United Kingdom, and to the development of the resources of Ireland. In 1841, shortly after the accession of the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) to power, he brought the subject at some length under the consideration of the House. He wrote four or five small pamphlets on the subject, and from all the circumstances which he had stated, he thought he was entitled to say that he had given a good deal of consideration to the subject. The railway with which he was connected was the Irish Great Western Railway. It was not got up by solicitors or engineers, as those things generally were, it having originated principally with a noble Friend of his, now no more, the Marquess of Downshire, and himself. The undertaking was not in any shape connected with stockbrokers or stockjobbers, and consequently it experienced the greatest possible hostility, not only from a rival company, but from stockjobbers also, and there was nothing that could be possibly done, fair or unfair, which was not practised in opposition to it; but, notwithstanding that opposition, applications for shares were made to the amount of three millions sterling. He would now state shortly how the shares were allotted. He was opposed to any shares being given to persons in Ireland, from his experience of the Drogheda Railway, where parties after taking shares, and when they were at a large premium, refused afterwards to pay up; and he desired, therefore, as much as possible to place the shares in the hands of capitalists here, and all the applications were accordingly transmitted to the Board of Directors here. It was stated that a good deal of negligence had been shown by persons in the management of the company; but he could show that no such negligence had been exhibited. They appointed the Messrs. Pillans and Co., brokers in Edinburgh; and he believed the Scotch Members present would admit that no more respectable parties could have been appointed: in Liverpool, they appointed Mr. Barber; in Dublin, they appointed Mr. Latouche; and in London, Mr. Heseltine; and in those towns which he had named, no shares were given to any individual who applied for them without being approved by the broker in each town. The list was left in London for a long time with Mr. Heseltine, and inquiries were made into the respectability of parties applying for shares. Mr. Heseltine was the broker in London, Mr. Harris was the solicitor; a parliamentary agent of eminence was appointed, a provisional committee was also appointed, after which they went over the list of allotted shares, and the result of their scrutiny was, that applications amounting to two millions sterling were rejected as bad. At that time, advertisements were sent round to the newspapers in England, to state that the company was about to be dissolved, and in consequence of those advertisements a great number of shareholders refused to pay up. The Company, in consequence of this, put advertisements in the papers, stating that all those shares which were not paid up should be forfeited; but notwithstanding that, many refused to pay up, and great numbers of the shares remained unpaid: he would call particular attention to that fact, as it had been skilfully imputed that there had been a good deal of jobbing in that respect. The money required by the Standing Orders was not to be had; the shares were at a discount of 7*s.* 6*d.*; no Report had been made by the Board of Trade; and at this time several directors, amongst them an officer of great distinction and wealth, came forward and said that they would take the shares which had been returned as forfeited—that they would pay up the deposits, and enable the Company to go on. An allotment of shares was then made by the Company, and not a single share was reserved for any director, or the relative or friend of any director. He (Mr. French) held forty shares. He never held more in that or any other railway. He held them all at that moment, and up to that time he had never parted with one of them; and, under those circumstances, an imputation was made against him that he was desirous for the success of that railway for the advancement of his own personal interest. Now, under any circumstances, all that he could lose by those shares was 30*l.*, and that could scarcely tempt him to take the course which had been imputed to him. There were a number of other things which he might state to the House in connexion with the history of the Company, but he would not trespass on the time of the House; and he would, therefore, go at once to the reference which had been made to the speech which had been attributed to him, and the accuracy of which he fully admitted. An answer had been attempted to be given to that speech, and in the answer to which he referred, he was represented as having canvassed the support of an eminent individual in another place. It was true that he did see that individual for a few minutes, and that he asked that any opposition might be withheld until his (Mr. French's) noble Friend, who was then absent, should be in his place to answer any objection which might be urged. It was said, indeed, that he used very flattering terms to that individual; but he (Mr. French) never knew that he possessed such powers of flattering as to be able in two minutes to change the opinions of one of the most eminent men of the day. He had made four statements, one of which was, that private interviews had been held with an agent, and that letters had been written; but that had been since explained by the statement that the agent had not been allowed to open the subject, and that the letters had not been read; and it was stated that instead of the individual to whom he alluded having said that he would bring down the shares to a discount, that that would be the result of the evidence. The evidence, however, had not been published, and he had no opportunity of seeing it. With respect to the charge of browbeating witnesses, as that was a Secret Committee, he had to take his impression from what the wit nesses told him. It was not to Mr. Parkes's evidence that he particularly alluded, although it went to show that in the case of forty other railways the rule of reference had not been required. He, in speaking of the witnesses, particularly alluded to Mr. Mitchell, and the evidence of the secretary; and having stated these facts, he did not now deem it necessary to pursue the matter further. The other part of the answer applied to a portion of his obsevations which was caused by the application, as he had been given to understand, of a peculiarly offensive expression relative to himself—in consequence of which he felt peculiarly hurt, greatly irritated, and, consequently, he spoke of that expression with strong excitement. The individual to whom it was attributed had since said that he had not used the expression; that it was written by a Quaker, who was a stockbroker in Dublin, and handed to him, and in that way it appeared in the form of a question. As the individual to whom he had alluded had stated that the question was not invented by him, he would not, therefore, say anything more in reference to it. He was prepared to state that, having used strong personal expressions, which he applied to an individual under mistaken feelings, but finding that he did not use the expression which he (Mr. French) was under the impression when he spoke had been used against him, he had no hesitation in saying that he at once withdrew all the expressions which he had used with regard to that individual; and he would further say, as every man of proper feeling would say, that he regretted having used an expression which was painful to that individual, or to any other person.

Mr. Clive, who was nearly inaudible, stated (as we understood) that the question of reference had not been entered into before the Committee of that House to which the Bill had been referred.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer trusted that the statement which had been just made by the hon. Member would have the effect of allaying any irritation which the expressions the hon. Member had been described as having used on a former occasion appeared to him calculated to create. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) should be the last person in that House to prolong a discussion of that nature; but perhaps he might take the liberty of suggesting a more cautious observance of the rule of that House, not to comment on acts of individuals of the other House of Parliament, either in their legislative or their judicial capacity. The only mode in which they could secure themselves from attack was by a due observance of what was due to others; and if they wished to preserve their own privileges, they ought to be careful to set the example of not violating the privileges of the other House of Parliament. The best way to act was, to abstain from acting or speaking upon what rumour stated occurred in another place. He thought it his duty to make those few observations in consequence of what had occurred.

Mr. B. Escott said, that he was in his place when the hon. Gentleman (Mr. French) addressed the House, and he did not hear one single word of what he said.

Subject at an end.

COUNTY RATES.] House in Committee on the County Rates Bill.

On Clause 11,

"If overseers neglect to make return, or wilfully make a false return or statement of the full and fair annual value of the property within the parish, expenses of Committee to be paid by the parish,"—

Mr. Darby moved—

"To insert the words, 'at which the property is rated to the Poor,' instead of the words, 'the full and fair annual value of the property.'"

The House divided on the Question, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:—Ayes 43; Noes 11: Majority 32.

Mr. Hawes wished to inquire of the noble Lord opposite (Lord G. Somerset), who was the only Member of the Government then present, if this Bill was sanctioned by the Government, and if the Government intended that it should pass? It was a Bill which, in his opinion, preserved all the evils of the old County Rates Act, which had led to all the inequalities of assessment which had hitherto been the opprobrium of the system. He was anxious to know if the Bill, as it stood at present, had received the sanction of the Government?

Mr. Grainger, before the noble Lord answered the question of the hon. Gentleman, wished to express his surprise that in a Bill of this nature, so important an element as the returns of the Income and Property Tax should have been thrown out of consideration.

Lord G. Somerset had read the clauses of the Bill, and, without going generally into its provisions at that moment, was ready to say that he thought it should receive the approbation of the House.

Clauses of the Bill agreed to.

House resumed. Bill to be reported.

COMPENSATION--DEATH BY ACCIDENTS.] The House in Committee on the Death by Accidents Compensation Bill.

On Clause 1,

Mr. Bernal said, he approved of the Bill as far as it went, and thought that it should be coupled and go together with the Deodands Bill, which had just come down from the Lords. He expressed his astonishment that none of the law officers of the Crown were present when a Bill of such importance was before the House. He himself did not think the clauses of the Bill sufficiently comprehensive to embrace all the cases of accident which might occur, arising from misfeasance.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer would not give his opinion upon the various provisions of the Bill, in the absence of his hon. and learned Friends. Their absence had been occasioned by an impression that the adjourned debate on New Zealand would have taken the precedence of other business.

Mr. Bouverie said, this Bill had been carefully considered in the other House, and had received the sanction of Lords Brougham, Cottenham, Campbell, and Denman.

Clause agreed to, as were the remaining clauses of the Bill.

House resumed. Report to be received.

SLAVE TRADE (BRAZIL).] Sir R. Peel said, it would be remembered that when he moved the second reading of the Brazilian Slave Trade Bill, he was requested by an hon. Gentleman opposite to postpone the Committee until he had ascertained whether the correspondence which had passed between the Government of Brazil and this country, in reference to the subject of the Slave Trade, could be laid before the House; and that he had on that occasion promised that he would look into that correspondence, and if he found that he could, consistently with his public duty, produce it, he would. He had since examined the correspondence in question; and as he saw nothing in it which should prevent its production, he would now lay it on the Table, and he had no doubt that it would be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow (this day).

Papers laid on the Table, and ordered to be printed.

NEW ZEALAND — ADJOURNED DEBATE.] The Order of the Day for going into Committee of Supply having been read, the Adjourned Debate upon the Amendment moved by Mr. C. Buller, on Monday, on the subject of New Zealand, was resumed.

Captain Rous commenced by observing, that although he could not concur with the hon. and learned Gentleman in that which appeared now to be his principal ground of complaint—the absence of representative government in New Zealand, he was glad to find, from what fell from him the other night, that he had altered his sentiments as to the character of the New Zealand natives, whom in the previous discussion he had described as the greatest liars and cowards in existence. The right hon. Member for Taunton had denied that this was a mere dispute between the New Zealand Company and the Government; but he (Captain Rous) had at that moment in his hand a letter, which had emanated from the secret committee of the Company, and copies of which had been circulated amongst Members of that House, in which it was distinctly declared that the dispute was between the New Zealand Company and the Government; and he might here be excused for saying, that he believed it was quite an unusual thing to send such letters to Members under similar circumstances. He was anxious to know in what character the New Zealand Company came before them—whether as suppliants requiring assistance, or as patriots denouncing the measures and impugning the conduct of the Government? Was it the object of the Company to purchase a territory equal in extent to Great Britain; or did they come forward to obtain a loan of money wherewith to pay their debts? It was quite clear that the one position was incompatible with the other. In the first place, he thought it was necessary that the New Zealand Company, in calling upon them to take cognizance of charges against the Government, should show that they themselves come forward with clean hands. Now, he charged the Company with having sold 120,000*l.* worth of land in New Zealand, while really and bonâ fide they had not a single acre of land belonging to them in the Colony; and he charged them, besides, with having inveigled persons to go out to New Zealand, and not keeping faith with them when they got there. There was another question which he had before put to hon. Gentlemen opposite, but which, as it had not yet been answered, he would repeat. It appeared that there were 16,000 shares, or 40,000*l.* in money, which had never been properly accounted for by the New Zealand Company. What he wanted to know was, what equivalent they received for these shares — into whose pockets the money went, and what was the reason of the outlay? The only answer he had been as yet able to obtain to the question was from the hon. Member for Cockermouth (Mr. Aglionby), who told him that if he would go to the New Zealand House he would undertake to show him the accounts. This was not a plain answer to a plain question, and he hoped that those hon. Gentlemen who were connected with the Company would not, by continuing to withhold a full explanation upon this point, afford the House and the public further grounds for suspecting that something wrong had taken place. Again, when the New Zealand Company came there and declared their intention to propose a loan, he wanted to know, while the capital was 300,000*l.*, of which 160,000*l.* only had been received, leaving this 40,000*l.* unaccounted for—he wanted to know was it a business-like way of proceeding to borrow money from the Government, there being 100,000*l.* of the capital not yet paid up? Under the circumstances, it appeared to him that the Company had forfeited their charter, or at least that it was in abeyance. Then he contended that it was altogether impossible that the Governor of the Colony, whoever he might be, could perform his duty satisfactorily to the Queen and the public, so long as there existed in New Zealand an imperium in imperio. With respect to the sovereignty of the country, many of the native chiefs would rather die than resign it to Her Majesty, and he could tell the House that the natives would not pay 2*d.* an acre for either cultivated or uncultivated land; that they would not pay customs duties; and that if the Crown of England would not purchase their lands, they would sell them to whom they pleased. A petition had been presented to the House by the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard (Mr. C. Buller), from a gentleman in New Zealand, praying that a system of local representative government might be established in the Colony, to become members of which all the permanent inhabitants should be eligible! But what was meant by "permanent inhabitants?" Did they intend to permit the natives to become members of the proposed legislature? If so, how were things to be managed—were the debates to be carried on in English or in the native tongue? The riches of the natives consisted, too, in a great measure, in the possession of slaves; and he wished to know whether hon. Gentlemen were prepared to recognise that system of slavery? He considered the proposal to establish representative government in New Zealand to be one of the most absurd and ridiculous project that could be conceived. But the day of deliberation, with regard to New Zealand had now passed, and the period for action had arrived. They were about to send to that Colony a young Governor, who, whatever might be his other merits, could not have the advantage of much experience. Now, supposing the affairs of New Zealand should assume a still more serious aspect, and that it became necessary to send out two regiments, with a brigadier-general to command them, would they put him under the orders of this young officer, who had only served as a subaltern? He would put it to hon. Members in either branch of Her Majesty's service, whether any system could work well in which a subaltern was allowed to give orders to an old general officer? If the state of affairs in New Zealand became worse, it would be necessary to act upon the recommendations of the Select Committee of that House; it would be necessary to employ native troops, to keep up a large naval and military force in the Colony, and to sow jealousy and ill-will among the natives. Since the period of the battle of Wairau, it must have been evident to every man of common sense, that a day of retribution must come, and that torrents of blood must be shed to wash out the disgrace inflicted on the British name, by the defeat of a body of Englishmen by an equal number of natives; and the recent occurrence at Russell had tended to aggravate the feeling of hatred and resentment between the colonists and the natives. He must be allowed to say that no blame attached to his gallant Friend, Captain Fitzroy, for his conduct at the time of that fatal conflict. It was his duty, as Governor of the Colony, to remain at head quarters; and, under the circumstances, it was impossible for him to leave Auckland. The bad feeling which existed between the missionaries and the British settlers had been alluded to by several hon. Members during the debates on this subject; and, though he would not say one word in disparagement of the Bishop of New Zealand, for whom he entertained the highest respect, he must say that some of the missionaries had done much to promote ill-feeling between the colonists and the natives. Some of those missionaries had spoken to the natives of the English settlers, in the Maori language, as "devils." The colonists had not been backward in their turn in explaining to the natives that these missionaries were a set of lazy, ignorant men, who, not being capable of gaining an honest livelihood at home, had been sent out to the Colony. Some of the missionaries had bought large tracts of land, and their object had been to get rid of other Europeans, in order to retain in their own hands the virtual sovereignty of the country. The House ought now to endeavour to learn wisdom from experience, and he would presume to advise the Government as to the course he thought it would be prudent in them to pursue. He would advise them to send out to New Zealand a brigadier-general, with 1,000 soldiers, in two of the ships of the line now cruising in the Channel. He would deprive the New Zealand Company of their charter, paying them what might be considered a just equivalent. He would guarantee to the British settlers the right and title to their lands, awarding them also a pecuniary compensation; and he would dispense with the protectors of natives, and have more protectors of Englishmen. If this were done, they might depend upon it, that a great improvement would speedily be apparent in the condition and prospects of the Colony.

Mr. Ward said, that as he had not taken any part in the previous debates, he might, as Chairman of the Committee appointed in 1836, on the subject of Colonial Lands, which had given rise to most of the subsequent projects of colonization, on the self-supporting system, be permitted to state his views on this question. He must here say, that he was not in any way connected with the New Zealand Company, nor had he been since the first establishment of that Company. The hon. and gallant Officer who just sat down had made three charges against the New Zealand Company. He accused them of selling land which they did not possess, of inveigling agricultural labourers by false representations to go out to the Colony, and of giving no explanation of an item of 40,000*l.* in their accounts. With reference to the last charge, he (Mr. Ward) was informed, that it appeared by the published accounts of the Company, that this sum of 40,000*l.* was paid to a pre-existing company for land actually acquired in New Zealand, and which had since been transferred to the Government. Then as to the charge of selling land which they did not possess; if the theory of the hon. and gallant Officer was correct, that New Zealand at the time to which he referred was a perfectly independent state, over which the Government of this country had no control, the Company had a most undoubted right to sell any land they might have acquired. But they had sent out the means of giving for any land they might purchase, ten times, nay, a thousand times, the price which had been given by previous purchasers; and they had, therefore, a certainty of acquiring a sufficient quantity of land to meet the sales they might make. The hon. and gallant Member also complained that the Company had inveigled labourers to New Zealand without securing to them in the Colony the comforts and advantages of civilized life which they had enjoyed in this country. Why, those labourers went to New Zealand to escape the evils of civilized life—to avoid the pressure which prevented them from obtaining here the full reward of their exertions—to better their condition; and, until the unhappy blight occasioned by subsequent misunderstandings between the Company and the Colonial Office, they were in most happy and prosperous circumstances. He fully concurred in many of the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster. He agreed with him that our conduct with regard to New Zealand had been marked by most unfortunate vacillation. We ought never to have acknowledged the independence of those islands. It was said that this was done in order to prevent their colonization by other nations; but had our recognition of the independence of Tahiti prevented the occupation of that island by the French? The Treaty of Waitangi had been strongly condemned, and the conduct of Captain Hobson in concluding such a Treaty had been severely censured; but it must be remembered that that gallant Officer had no choice, for when he agreed to that Treaty he had but a small force at command, and he possessed no moral or political power. He was convinced that they never could solve the difficulties of the Colony without taking that Treaty as the basis of an absolute sovereignty on the part of England. The hon. and gallant Member had said that it was impossible at present to entertain the question as to the establishment of a system of representative government in New Zealand; and in that opinion he concurred. He had heard the other night, with some pain, the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard on this subject. He was not so much dissatisfied as the hon. and learned Gentleman with the statements in Lord Stanley's letter; and he must say that he did not perceive any discrepancy between those statements and the promises held out by the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government. He believed that a system of municipal government, with powers of local taxation, suited to the wants and condition of the Colony, was all that could at present be usefully established in New Zealand; and he would be satisfied to see the principles laid down by the two right hon. Baronets opposite (Sir R. Peel and Sir J. Graham), in a former debate, fairly carried out at the earliest possible opportunity. He must confess that, if he had had the conduct of the case of the New Zealand Company on the last occasion when this question was discussed, he should not have felt it necessary to divide the House; for he would have taken the immense admissions made by the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Treasury, and the right hon. Home Secretary, as to a certain extent satisfactory; not giving him all that he wanted, but showing that they felt the serious responsibility which rested upon them, and that they were disposed fairly to entertain the question, and to deal with it on large principles. He knew that many Members of that House regarded this as a great case against the Government; but he could not consider it in that light. He looked upon it not as a party but a national question. There was in New Zealand a numerous race of aborigines, whom we were forcing into a collision with us; and we had in that Colony 10,000 English settlers, men and women. He called upon hon. Gentlemen to remember that they were blighting the prospects of this community by the unworthy squabbles which had for some time been carried on. [Ironical cries of "Hear, hear," from the Opposition.] He did not like that cheer. When he used the term unworthy squabbles, he meant that, as practical men, and men of sense, they were bound to ask what was the cause of these disputes. Take it where they would—take New Zealand from north to south—take the disturbances at the Bay of Islands or in the valley of the Hutt—go to Auckland, or to Wellington—ask what had given rise to all these disputes, and they would find that the want of some broad intelligible principle in dealing with the land question was at the root of all the evil. The right hon. Baronet at the head of the Home Department had fully acknowledged that this was the fact in his last speech. The settlers in New Zealand had only a doubtful title to their land. Now, in this country, in the midst of civilization, a doubtful title was the worst curse which could fall upon a property; but how much were all its evils aggravated when they affected a country divided between a small white population and a nation of brave, but unenlightened barbarians. The patience of angels would not stand the state of matters in the distracted Colony in question, much less that of New Zealand and the native savages. He was sure that the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government, so long as he tolerated the continuance of such a system, must feel that he was in some sort responsible for its consequences. He contended that the first duty of a Government, taking a wide and comprehensive view of all the circumstances of the case—he was sure that their first duty, as their first wish ought to be, was to put an end to the present system, and they could only do so by laying down some broad intelligible principle to guide them in dealing with the land question. The noble Lord the Member for London was the only statesman who, in his opinion, had taken a large and enlightened view of the subject. He had never seen a more gratifying scene than the reconciliation of the noble Lord with the New Zealand Company, after the first misunderstanding had been got over. But the impression which had arisen from those original differences between the Colonial Office and the Company had never been effaced in the Colony. It had been taken up by the officials there one after the other, and from the highest to the lowest—from the Governor to the polic magistrate. As the hon. and gallant Member had said, the missionaries began the work of misrepresentation by stigmatizing as a devil every Christian who had not learned his Christianity in their particular school. Mr. Shortland's first mission to Wellington, upon the arrival of the colonists sent out by the Company, was to assert, in a rude and violent manner, what he conceived to be the authority of the Crown, apparently under the belief that they were going to dispute it. Why, a more distinguished or a more loyal body never left England. Then look to the results of this system; look to the conduct of the protectors of the natives. Nothing, in fact, could be more unfortunate than the choice of all who had hitherto wielded power in New Zealand. It was distressing to think that the government of the Colony should have fallen into such hands as those of Captain Hobson and Captain Fitzroy. And what had they heard urged on the part of Government as to the present condition of the Colony? Why, they were told the other night that alarm was subsiding—that reinforcements had been sent out—and that the condition of the Colony at the date of the last accounts was not worse than it had been some time before. Why, he asked the hon. Under Secretary for the Colonies, what could be worse than that former condition? Why should the people in New Zealand be left struggling for land? There was enough and to spare for a population an hundred times more dense? But what had we done? We had attempted to settle matters by means of the subtilties of English law—we had tried to initiate the savages of New Zealand into English law, by teaching them its chicaneries and tricks—we had employed and developed all the worst points of English law in New Zealand, without any of its redeeming principles. Of what avail was it to attempt to extend to savages the legal rights of civilized Englishmen? All that was wanted was, simple common sense decisions in disputed matters. Had they sold their land? To whom had they sold it? What had they got for it? How much did they expect to have got for it? Such were the questions which ought to have been put and answered, and settled. One Commissioner acting on such principles might have settled the whole of the claims in dispute in six weeks. All they might do would be useless, did they not send to the Colonies some one familiar with such a mode of dealing with such questions—did they not send him out entrusted with the most unlimited confidence, or with the clearest instructions. All would be useless, were not the Cabinet disposed to throw over the unbecoming disputes between the Company and the Colonial Office—disputes unworthy of Lord Stanley, for it was not the duty of an English Colonial Secretary to strive for victory in a contest of correspondence with an English commercial Company; but to labour to carry out those sentiments and those views which the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government had the other day enunciated, and which, in despite of the letter he had lately addressed to the noble Lord the Member for Staffordshire (Viscount Ingestre), he trusted that he had not modified. [Sir R. Peel: Not in the least.] If we had a distinct assurance that the matter would be practically taken up during the next six months, that the Government would really devote itself to the question, then his exhortation would be, to leave the matter in the hands of the Government; but he could not say that such advice should be given when the right hon. Baronet, in his letter to the noble Lord the Member for Staffordshire, stated that his views upon the subject perfectly coincided with those of his noble Colleagues at the head of the Colonial Department. He had certainly thought there was a difference between them; but he could understand, considering how inconvenient and disagreeable it was for one Cabinet Minister to trench upon the province of another, how such difficulties might be and were got over. [Mr. Sheil whispered to the hon. Member.] Yes; nothing could be more apt with respect to the relations between the right hon. Baronet and the noble Lord, than the quotation suggested by his right hon. Friend—Nec tecum vivere possum, nec sine te. He put it to the right hon. Baronet whether this was not a question entitled to Ministerial attention? The Cabinet consisted of English Ministers, not the Ministers of a party; and he knew no man who had shown a stronger sense of his consciousness that he was the Minister of the country, and not of a party, than had the right hon. Baronet now at the head of the Government. He now, then, called upon him, as an English Minister, to take pity on the two races who were now cooped up in New Zealand. A great duty was imposed upon him; and he trusted that, in common with the noble Lord the Member for London—in common with that other noble Lord (Lord Howick) whose presence they must in future be deprived of—in common with the majority of the Committee who investigated the matter—the right hon. Baronet could arrive at the conclusion, that the literal and obvious construction of the Treaty of Waitangi was perfectly compatible with the settlement of the claims still in dispute. He implored Government to take up the question in the spirit in which they might deal with it—to give to the settlers who had emigrated to New Zealand that protection which would restore to the English the position they had lost there. They had forfeited the benefit of the impression of moral superiority which they formerly possessed; and as to physical force, the natives were their superiors. If, then, what had occurred were not to occur again—if the best blood of the Colony were not to be again poured forth—if the best men in the Colony were not to be forced to devote themselves for its protection—the Government must take up the question with the determination to deal with it practically, promptly, and as he trusted they would deal with it—in a spirit of liberality and justice.

Mr. G. Palmer rose to correct certain errors in the statements of the hon. and gallant Officer near him, relative to the New Zealand Company. It was with the perfect consent—nay, according to the wish of Mr. Huskisson—that the first expedition was sent out from this country. He understood that there was some impediment to Government undertaking the settlement of New Zealand at that time; some agreement, as he was told, existing between France and England, not to extend their Colonial possessions between South America and New Holland. The expedition so often alluded to, however, sailed. Certain lands were purchased; and they were told, that if they wanted protection, a frigate would be sent out to the coast of New Zealand. It was then supposed that Russia was not so friendly a Power as he was willing to believe she was at present. The Coromandel was sent out to those islands, and came home loaded with spars. There was a sort of agreement with the Government, that the Navy would take whatever spars or hemp were furnished by the Company. Well, then, he contended, that the Company, having purchased lands under such encouragement, they had as good a title to them as any man in this country to his estate. To give a further proof that the Government sanctioned the proceedings of the Company: the parties to the expedition disagreed; and when a question was raised as to sending out troops, such a proceeding was declared to be dangerous, as the natives would resist if it was supposed the Government would interfere with the possession of lands which they had sold the Company. This showed what the feelings of the natives were before they were taught the quibbles of our courts of law. Allusion had been made in the former debate to the small consideration paid for the land; but the expenses of the expedition should be borne in mind, when estimating the amount of the purchase. If the title of the former Company was good, that of the new Company, to whom it was conveyed, was equally good. He hoped that the declaration made by the right hon. Baronet at the head f the Government on a former occasion would be carried out in the sense in which it was understood by every Member of that House who heard it. If it were, he was satisfied it would have the effect of pacifying the Colony, and bringing comfort and security to the settlers. He was sure that, in the end, all just complaints would be listened to, and the grounds of them removed by the Government; and that the prosperity of the settlement would be resumed. He apprehended, however, that if the instructions to the Governor were acted on, his rule would not be satisfactory. He asked, what would be the effect of sending down a commissioner to one of our counties, to disturb the title to all land which was strictly proved? It must be borne in mind, that we were dealing with a Colony in which title-deeds were not registered; and in which very often the only proof of the transfer of land was to be found in the breast of him who had parted with it. The settlers went from this country under a promise that they would receive protection from the Home Government. They neither received that protection, nor were they allowed to protect themselves. He lamented very much that any difference should have arisen between the Company and Lord Stanley; but he was sure that ultimately the interests of the Colony would be found to be safe in the hands of the Government.

Sir C. Napier said, that a question affecting the safety of a British settlement containing from 10,000 to 11,000 persons, was of very great importance to the country; and the more so, seeing the rapid strides which the Colony of New Zealand had made since it was first founded, in 1839. It was lamentable to see a Colony which in 1841 had 221 ships, and 80,000*l.* worth of produce in its ports, reduced to the state of anarchy which the late accounts exhibited. He considered the noble Lord at the head of the Colonial Office was greatly to blame for not having taken some measures to protect the settlers in New Zealand, after he had acquired such distinct proofs of the hostility of the cannibals by whom they were surrounded. Several murders had been committed by the natives, and several attacks had been made on European settlers and voyagers of late years, by the New Zealanders, till the massacre occurred at Wairau, all of which had been permitted to pass unpunished by the Governments which had been then and since established in those parts. Such a long continued series of neglects on the part of the Government would almost seem to evince that there existed a desire on the part of the noble Lord (Stanley) that the Colony should not succeed. The impunity with which the New Zealanders were permitted to perpetrate the massacre of Wairau, had undoubtedly led to the last attack at the Bay of Islands; and the New Zealand Company had distinctly foreseen that occurrence, when they found that the death of Captain Wakefield, and the other persons killed at Wairau, was suffered to go entirely unpunished by Captain Fitzroy. That the recent attack would not have been the last that had been made upon the settlements in New Zealand, he would take upon himself to say; indeed, he had no doubt that the next accounts would bring intelligence that Auckland had been attacked. He considered that the noble Lord at the head of the Colonial Office had greatly neglected his duty in not despatching a force to New Zealand, after the accounts of the massacre had reached England. He might easily have done so, as the conclusion of the war in China had left one or two ships on that station at his disposal. He ought not to have left a British settlement at the mercy of 130,000 cannibals. He (Sir C. Napier) could not account to himself for the apathy and neglect which had characterized the proceedings of the civil, military, and naval authorities in New Zealand. When the flagstaff was cut down for the first time, why did not the military form some defences round it, so as to prevent a second outrage of that kind from being successful? It almost seemed to him as if there were something in the climate of New Zealand which enervated those who came within its influence, and which had incapacitated the Governor, the military, and above all, the naval officers, from taking prompt, vigorous, and proper measures for the defence of the settlers. The hon. and gallant Officer proceeded to read Governor Fitzroy's last despatch, containing the account of the attack at the Bay of Islands, and asked whether anything had been done to save Auckland from a similar attack? His hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Captain Rous) had expressed an opinion that two line of battle ships ought to be sent out immediately to protect the Colony; but he (Sir C. Napier) would rather recommend that two transatlantic steamers should be at once taken up, and sent out with a battalion on board, by which means they might yet arrive in time to save Auckland from a further attack. The magistrate at the Bay of Islands had, according to the despatches last received, written to Governor Fitzroy, requesting him to come immediately to that place. But Captain Fitzroy had replied that he would not quit Auckland. Had a civilian, one unaccustomed to war and its consequences, sent back such an answer, he should not have felt much surprise, as fighting was not in such a person's line; but he confessed he did feel astonishment in finding that a naval officer had refused to repair to a place which was menaced by savages, and which was protected only by a few soldiers, commanded by a mere lad, and assisted by some half-trained settlers. The Governor, if he did not choose to go himself, might at least have sent the military officer next in command, who was a lieutenant-colonel, to the assistance of the settlers at the Bay of Islands. The assistance of such an officer would have enabled the British to baffle the savages. What would have been the fate of the British settlers at the Bay of Islands, if there had not been an American frigate there, by which they had been all received on board, and conveyed to a place of safety? Too much praise could not be awarded to the American captain for his courage and kindness in first placing the settlers in safety, and then returning to the protection of the missionaries who remained at the Bay of Islands. His hon. and gallant Friend had said that Captain Fitzroy had acted rightly in not quitting his post at Auckland. That might be his hon. and gallant Friend's opinion; but if he knew his hon. and gallant Friend's disposition—and he believed he did—the very first thing he (Captain Rous) would have done would have been to go with all speed to the place of danger, and save his fellow countrymen from the savages who had attacked them. Then, in another portion of the Correspondence, he found a lieutenant speaking of the Hazard being about to be surprised by the natives. Talk of an officer of an 18-gun corvette expecting, when moored in an open roadstead, to be surprised by a parcel of native savages! Why it was most absurd. During the long war between England and France, cutting out a corvette of 18 guns, even by British sailors and British soldiers, was considered one of the most gallant exploits that could be performed. It had not often been done, and never without an enormous loss; and yet this officer expected his corvette to be surprised by a few savages. Having animadverted upon the conduct of some, it now became his pleasing duty to express his high approbation of the conduct of Acting Commander Robertson. Had every one there acted like that gentleman, or had he not fallen wounded as he did, the Bay of Islands still would have been in the possession of the British Government. In conclusion, he would express a hope, that when that officer should recover from his wounds, the Admiralty would be extremely bountiful to him for the gallant services which he had rendered.

Viscount Ingestre would not have risen to take a part in this debate had he not been at the head of the deputation which waited upon the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government at the close of the last debate. Those in that House who were well-wishers of the Government, and yet who did not approve of the policy hitherto adopted in New Zealand, waited upon the right hon. Baronet, and explained to him the painful position in which they felt themselves. They stated that there had been ample discussion in that House; that there had been, generally speaking, an absence of all party feeling, and that after that debate, they thought it would be advisable that everything which had passed should be sunk in oblivion. They were met in the most frank and cordial spirit by the right hon. Gentleman, who at once put them into communication with the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies; and he also met them in the same spirit, evincing an anxious wish to bring matters to an amicable termination. The deputation urged upon the noble Lord five points in behalf of the New Zealand Company. The first was, an immediate grant of its lands to the Company. To that the noble Lord answered that he was anxious to do so as far as he could, but that he could not give what the Government had not the power to give. After some discussion, they would perceive from the Minutes, page 5, that "with regard to the above settlements and also to Teranaka, Manawatu, and Wanganni, Lord Stanley communicated to the deputation the precise instructions which he proposed to send to Governor Grey by the next mail of the 7th of July." As to the charge which had been made against the noble Lord relative to these instructions, he entirely acquitted the noble Lord of any blame. He attached no importance whatever to that point, as what had occurred was evidently the result of a mistake. The noble Lord proceeded to read from the Papers before referred to the remaining points to which the deputation directed Lord Stanley's attention, viz.—the objections of the Company to the Crown's right of pre-emption of land in New Zealand being waved, and purchases being permitted to be made directly from the natives; the future seat of government; and the future government of the Colony. Upon this last point he personally was disposed to give every credit to the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies. His arguments appeared to be perfectly sound and just; and he altogether agreed with the noble Lord, that from the scattered state of the settlers it would be impossible to bring them together in the first instance to act as a representative government; but that the best way was at first to give them a voice in the municipal institutions to be established in the Colony. He did not wish to enter on the general question before the House, as it had been so fully discussed already. The question, however, was a very important one, affecting the interests of the natives, of the settlers from this country, and of the Company. Charges had been made against the New Zealand Company, but he must say that he never knew a set of gentlemen who acted from purer and more disinterested motives. No lucrative results could follow from their embarking in that Company, and he did think it hard that his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Westminster, and his hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford, should impute motives of a sordid nature to them. With respect to the late Governor, Captain Fitzroy, he should state, that he had known him long in the naval service. He had had the honour and pleasure of a long acquaintance with him, and he had hailed with pleasure his appointment to the important post of Governor, because he knew his honourable mind, and thought, from his having been in that country before, that he would have been likely to carry out measures which would be the most beneficial for the Colony. He could not but express his deep sorrow, that the result had been so different—a circumstance which he could attribute only to Governor Fitzroy having imbibed a one-sided view, on which he had acted, without reference to circumstances as they occurred. He regretted most deeply that Captain Fitzroy's career in that Colony had not warranted the anticipations which he and many of his friends had formed of him. With reference to the catastrophe at Wairao, and the more recent one at the Bay of Islands, he was fully convinced, that had a firm and decisive course been adopted towards the natives from the commencement, nothing of the sort would ever have occurred, and they would not have had to deplore the loss of that able and excellent man, the late Captain Wakefield. As regarded the Treaty of Waitangi, he contended that there was a degree of discrepancy and contradiction in the way in which that Treaty had been acted on. On one hand, the Government stated, that the natives had actual possession of the soil; but that statement, they negatived, in a great measure, by a proclamation declaring that no person, native or settler, should sell his land under a certain price. That appeared to him to be most extraordinary; for if a man had any right to his property, he surely might sell it for what price he pleased. In conclusion, he (Lord Ingestre) would state, that he was most anxious for a settlement of this question. He did not treat it as a party question, and he should be delighted if a fair compromise could be adjusted. He did trust that some means might be had recourse to, to rid the question from the mass of difficulties in which it appeared to be involved, and that some satisfactory arrangements might be entered into by which that great and important Colony might be fostered and preserved.

Mr. Hawes said, that actuated by the same spirit in which the noble Lord opposite had just spoken—a spirit which had also been adopted by his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, in which all angry and party feeling had been dispensed with, he should endeavour to speak with all candour and fairness upon this subject. That was not a time to bandy party feeling; and if the right hon. Baronet had not altered his opinion since he last spoke, and was still willing to legislate in a conciliatory spirit, he (Mr. Hawes) owned that he should like to see that debate close at once with a speech of that description from the right hon. Gentleman, for he was sure that no other than public grounds could actuate that right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues in their proceedings; and if they were ready to bury in oblivion the disputes which had hitherto arisen on this subject, so was he with the view of bringing the question to a final and just settlement. He had always adopted the course which he then pursued, for when his hon. Friends were in power he opposed their views, being always of opinion that when the Crown once asserted its authority in New Zealand, the soil of that country ought to have vested in the Crown, which should have had the power to adjust all conflicting claims to the land, by whomsoever made. The hon. Member for Sheffield rather misunderstood what fell from the hon. Member for Liskeard in reference to Lord Stanley's instructions. All that the hon. Member for Liskeard seemed to wish was, that there should be municipal institutions, with ample powers for local self-government, and that out of those institutions there might be chosen a representative body; he did not mean such as there was in this country, but persons who would carry into the legislative council a fair amount of popular feeling. But to effect that you must have precise instructions. All that the New Zealand Company required was, that the Secretary of State should issue precise and definite instructions; and certainly those the noble Lord wrote, in reference to municipal institutions, were anything but precise. He did not rely on the noble Lord; but on the spirit of the speeches of the right hon. Baronets opposite, he (Mr. Hawes) had confidently relied. He believed there was not a member of the New Zealand Company that was not satisfied with those speeches. Immediately after their delivery, Mr. Somes, the late Governor, asked him whether it would be expedient to divide; he said that that was a question that ought to be carefully considered, and on consideration the opinion prevailed that the Company ought not to avoid going to a division, which was accordingly taken. Then came the question, had anything since occurred to justify a revival of the discussion? He did not think the news since received from New Zealand of itself sufficient; but there was another and much stronger cause for this fresh appeal to the House. The Company had had an interview with the Secretary for the Colonies, the minutes of which were on the Table of the House, and would show how many questions were not discussed and settled, but postponed; and they received a letter from the First Lord of the Treasury, addressed to Viscount Ingestre, in which he said—

"I regret that the directors are not satisfied by the result of the interview between Lord Stanley and the deputation: but, as my own sentiments are in concurrence with those expressed by Lord Stanley, and as I have entire confidence in the desire of Lord Stanley to promote the welfare of the Company, so far as he can do it consistently with his own sense of public duty, and with public engagements entered into with the sanction of the Crown, I must decline interfering with the discretion of Lord Stanley."

That was an expressed declaration on the part of the right hon. Baronet that he supported and was prepared to abide by the policy of Lord Stanley, although the speech which he delivered a short time previously was inconsistent with that policy. If the right hon. Baronet's speech was to be understood as being in full concurrence with the policy of the Colonial Office, which the right hon. Baronet arraigned, and which he now arraigned, he could only say, that there never was a speech delivered in that House which practised upon it such a delusion. He could not believe that it had been spoken for the purpose of averting an unfortunate division. The sentiments it expressed, he took to be those then and now sincerely entertained both by the right hon. Baronet himself and the Secretary of State for the Home Department. All he contended for was, that they were not in conformity with the policy which had been pursued by the Colonial Office; and that the fact of their not being so, fully justified the New Zealand Company in again appealing to that House. The right hon. Baronet said that he wished to act in perfect harmony with the New Zealand Company; but no one, looking to what had passed, could imagine that such a desire existed upon the part of the Colonial Office. He would say, rather, that the policy of that Office had been to put down the New Zealand Company; and he was supported in this belief by a reference to the public papers, from which it appeared that Governor Fitzroy had absolutely asserted that he anticipated hearing by the next mail that that Company was in a state of bankruptcy. The Attorney General, who had no great interest in questions of colonization, and who took up the blue book on this occasion just as he would have taken up a brief, said that they never would have heard of this question if the interests of the New Zealand Company had not been involved. The Government professed itself disposed to encourage colonization, and in favour of the establishment of a proper system to carry it out; but yet it had never done half so much towards that object as the New Zealand Company had achieved. It was objected to the Company that it was a joint-stock company; but was it not that House which obliged it to be so? He, therefore, contended that there could be no greater impolicy than throwing any obstructions in the way of that Company. It was said, that if this Company had no influence amongst Members of that House, that there would be no such discussions raised about our Colonies. Now, he thought it would be much for the benefit of this country and its Colonies, if there were similar companies connected with other Colonies, to bring their interests and government frequently under the consideration of Parliament. If such was the case, the system of our Colonial policy would be better regulated, and very different from what it was. Were not the discussions upon this subject important, if for no other thing than that they had called forth the admission from the Government that it was advisable to extend the principle of municipal and representative institutions to our Colonies? And if such an acknowledgment had been called forth long ago with regard to other Colonies of Great Britain, they would have been better and more cheaply governed than they now were. He believed it had been owing to erroneous information originally conveyed by the Missionary Society, that a feeling of hostility towards the New Zealand Company had been created here, and that this feeling had, in a great degree, influenced the conduct of the Colonial Office. But he trusted a proper sense of duty would henceforward induce that Department to change its policy, and adopt a different course towards a Colony which should now be regarded as a most important one, amongst other reasons, because our Colonial Estimates would soon begin to attract attention, when it was found necessary to hold our Colonies by force of arms. And now the question came to this—what were they to do? In the instructions to which he had before referred, there was nothing precise pointed out as to the course to be pursued in settling the differences between the Company, the Government, the settlers, and the natives. For his own part, he held it that the first and most important step to be taken was to settle at once the clear right of the Crown to the waste lands of New Zealand. He thought the Under Secretary to the Colonies was in some degree liable to the charge of inconsistency with respect to the opinions he now expressed. In the year 1839 or 1840, when, in opposition to the party then in power, and with whom he always had been in the habit of acting in public life, he had felt it to be his duty to move the adoption in that House of the Report of the Select Committee on the affairs of New Zealand; there were great efforts making against the Government of the day, and nothing was deemed too small or unimportant to be omitted in swelling the aggregate of the attack on the Administration then in office. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies had, with many others, voted for the reception and adoption of that Report, which advocated the necessity of the Crown becoming the proprietor of the whole of the territory and soil of New Zealand before any proper or good system of colonization could be carried into execution. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies had voted for that Report; and in the course of the debate on the present subject he seemed to take up a different view, nor had he made any reference to the letter of Lord Stanley, written in explanation of the agreement formerly entered into between Lord John Russell and the New Zealand Company. There was one thing, however, of great importance in the proper administration of the affairs of the Colony, and that was, that whatever Governor was sent out, he should have full power to act, so as to be enabled to meet any emergencies that might arise—should be explicitly entrusted with functions enabling him to perform his duties efficiently under any circumstances that might occur. If the Government thought that they could satisfactorily administer the affairs of New Zealand by means of a Governor who would be obliged to refer constantly to the Colonial Office at home, they would, he was persuaded, find themselves greatly mistaken. He believed it was in the power of the right hon. Baronet to terminate these angry contests, and to restore to New Zealand that state of prosperity which had attended the first efforts of the Company in that Colony. He was sure that every person connected with that Company would hail with joy any announcement on the part of the right hon. Baronet that he was determined on bringing that matter to an issue; and the suggestion which he had to make to the right hon. Gentleman was, that he should send out some person invested with ample powers to bring these unhappy disputes to a conclusion. By adopting that course the right hon. Baronet would, he believed, confer great benefits, not only on this country, but on the Colony of New Zealand, and great honour on himself and on his government.

Sir R. Peel said: Sir, before I make any observations on the particular Motion which has been brought forward by the hon. Member for Liskeard, I wish, in order that the current of those observations may not be interrupted, and that I may not omit to do justice to those whose names I am about to introduce—I wish in the first place, to make one or two remarks which have a bearing on the character and conduct of individuals. Sir, I must express my deep regret that, in the course of this debate, reflections have been made on the character of the hon. Gentleman who fills the situation of Under Secretary in the Colonial Office. That regret would be increased if it had not been for the honourable and ample testimony to his merits which was borne by a right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Labouchere), perfectly capable of appreciating those merits, from his having served in the same department with Mr. Stephen. Mr. Stephen has the honour of being closely connected by birth with two men who have left names which will long be memorable in the annals of this country. He is the son of a gentleman of great distinction, and he is the nephew of Mr. Wilberforce. It seems, however, as if that illustrious connexion operated, not as an advantage, but as a prejudice against him. Now I have had but little personal communication with Mr. Stephen, but I believe that a situation in a public office was never occupied by a man of higher integrity, of more disinterested views—of greater assiduity—of more profound knowledge—and of more distinguished acquirements than Mr. Stephen. [Mr. Roebuck: I said nothing against the acquirements or the character of Mr. Stephen.] The hon. and learned Gentleman said nothing against the private character of Mr. Stephen; but he said that the prejudices of Mr. Stephen might have influenced the proceedings of the Colonial Office. Now, I believe that the allegations respecting the prejudices of Mr. Stephen are totally unfounded. I believe him to be most willing to render every assistance in his power to his superiors in office; but I also believe that he never attempts to influence their conduct. I believe that he is wholly free from any connexion with the missionary party; and if he had any connexion with them, I have that confidence in his integrity and highmindedness which makes me perfectly certain that that circumstance would not influence him in the discharge of his duties. I believe that the people of this country know little of the real merits of Mr. Stephen; but I am persuaded that the time will come when justice will be done to his distinguished services. His labours are now unostentatious; but the time will arrive when this country will know what is the extent of the knowledge which Mr. Stephen possesses, how that knowledge has been made conducive to the public interest, and what have been the integrity and the high principles by which his conduct has been uniformly actuated. I have thought it right, having a personal knowledge of Mr. Stephen, and seeing that prejudices have occasionally risen in the public mind with respect to Mr. Stephen, and that erroneous impressions are entertained with respect to his influence—I have thought it right not to allow this debate to proceed further without doing what I could to remove those unfounded opinions. I know that Mr. Stephen feels most severely the unfounded imputations directed against him. He has expressed his willingness to relinquish his connexion with the Colonial Office; but such is the high sense of his merits entertained, not merely by this Government, but by successive Administrations, that it is our wish, as it has been their wish, that he should on no account relinquish the position which he holds, but that he should continue to give the public the great value of his services. There is another individual who has been alluded to, and to whom I wish to do justice; I mean that gallant officer Mr. Robertson, to whom the gallant Commodore has referred. The scene on which that gallant officer performed his services is a very distant one; and the services themselves may not have cast around them that eminence and distinction which sometimes attend services not more important; but I think it is for the public interest that, although the scene was a distant one, and although the numbers engaged in the conflict were comparatively small—I think it is for the public interest that we should show in the House of Commons that the distance of the scene and the comparative unimportance of the conflict do not make us oblivious of rare merit. Sir, I must say that his conduct stands forward in honourable contrast with the conduct of others concerned on that occasion; and I rejoice to find a British officer, not thinking whether his ship was to be surprised by a parcel of savages, but leaving that ship and setting on shore that gallant example which so many officers of our navy have before set, and rallying round him, until he was wounded, the flagging spirits of the civilians. And here I wish to make it known in the House of Commons that that conduct shall not pass unrewarded. In justice to him, and as an encouragement to others, that conduct shall receive its reward by the earliest opportunity being taken to give to him that promotion to which he is so eminently entitled. And now, Sir, I come to the particular Motion which is the subject of consideration to-night. The hon. Gentleman admits that it is incumbent on those who bring forward the Motion to assign good and sufficient reasons for its introduction. Sir, I certainly do think, that in the present state of New Zealand, and after the recent discussion which has taken place upon the subject, there ought to be some good and sufficient reasons assigned for again calling the attention of the House to the question, and for incurring the risk of widening the differences that have unfortunately prevailed between the authorities of this country to whom the management of the affairs of New Zealand is committed, and probably must continue to be committed. I think that those who are interested in the welfare of New Zealand ought rather to show an anxiety to forget the differences that have prevailed, and the controversies that have taken place; and that they ought studiously to avoid—unless they have some good and sufficient reasons to assign for such a course, that they ought studiously to avoid having recourse to any proceeding which could tend to embitter those differences, and to throw difficulty in the way of an harmonious concert and co-operation on the part of the authorities to whom I am referring. The hon. Gentleman admits that the unfortunate events which have recently taken place in New Zealand, in themselves constitute no reason for this Motion. The hon. Gentleman even admits that in the present state of New Zealand the unfortunate conflict which has lately taken place, and its probable consequences, should operate as a discouragement to a renewed discussion, rather than as an incentive to it. Well, but the hon. Gentleman also says, "I will assign to you the real reason for this Motion." Now, I trust that the House will bear with me while I examine whether or not that reason is well founded. If it be not well founded, I think the hon. Gentleman who has made this Motion has incurred a great responsibility. I do not deny his perfect right to make an appeal to the House of Commons. He has a constitutional right to make that appeal, whatever may be the consequences; but I think that if the object of the hon. Gentleman be to promote the welfare of New Zealand, prudential considerations ought to have prevented him from exercising that undoubted constitutional right. Sir, the only ground that can be assigned for this Motion—and it is avowed to be the only ground—is, that language was held by me and by my right hon. Friend, in the course of the last debate, which is at variance with the course we have since pursued. I am, indeed, acquitted of the intention of endeavouring to gain a majority by holding out delusive hopes. The hon. Gentleman does not attribute that to me. He says, however, that the language which I used had that effect, and that Members were induced to vote with the Government, or at least not to vote against them, because they had relied on the declarations made by my right hon. Friend and myself. He also says that the course we have since pursued is at variance with our declarations. Now, I propose to inquire whether it is or not. I am not about to relieve the hon. Gentleman from the necessity of dividing; but I am about to vindicate and to defend myself and my right hon. Friend from accusations which I believe to be unjust. I shall, however, confine myself on this occasion to the duty of vindication; and I do not mean to enter into criminatory attacks on the New Zealand Company. I shall not revive past differences; but I shall rather bear in mind that the New Zealand Company still continues a Company, and that it is desirable for the public interest that there should be a co-operation between that Company and the Government. I retain the opinions which I expressed on a former evening; but I shall endeavour to show that those opinions are in precise conformity with the course I have since taken, and that there is not therefore a pretence for this renewed appeal to the House. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard said, that he would not refer to any particular expressions I used in the speech I formerly delivered, but that he would rather allude to the general tone and spirit in which that speech was conceived. Sir, it was purposely conceived in a conciliatory spirit, and I purposely avoided any reference to past differences between the Colonial Office and the New Zealand Company. I wished to promote by the language I held and the spirit in which I spoke—I wished to promote the prospect of an early and a satisfactory settlement of disputes which cannot be prolonged without serious prejudice to the public service. But every word of the letter which I addressed to my noble Friend (Lord Ingestre), the Chairman of the New Zealand Committee—every word of that letter I am prepared to maintain; and if the hon. Gentleman thinks that the only mode in which we can avoid a record of hostile opinions upon this question is a statement on my part of a departure from the terms of that letter, such a statement I must tell him I am not prepared to make. I adhere to that letter; I say that I will not supersede my noble Friend in the conduct of the Colonial Office, I say that in the opinions of my noble Friend I concur, and that I believe my noble Friend to be influenced by a sincere desire to promote the welfare of the New Zealand Company, as far as he can promote it consistently with his duty to the Crown, and with good faith towards others. Those are the opinions which I expressed in that letter; and those are the opinions which I still entertain. The hon. Gentleman says—"Then do you mean to imply an approbation of the whole of the past correspondence?" That is not the point at issue. The question now is, whether the correspondence which has taken place since that speech was delivered, is at variance with the declarations I then made? That is the question, and the only question I have now to discuss. We have nothing now to do with the controversies of the years 1842 and 1843. I purposely abstain from noticing them; and as the objects of the Government are to consult the interests of that Colony, to lay the foundations of peace, and to consider how the British sovereignty can be maintained there in the best and most effectual manner, I think I should be acting most unworthily by noticing past disputes, and attempting to criminate any members of the Company. I do not mean to pursue such a course; and I shall confine myself to this question—whether there be anything in the communications which have appeared between the head of the Colonial Office and the New Zealand Company which is in the slightest degree at variance with the assurance that I gave, and the declarations that I made, not on my part merely, but in full concert, and after communicating with my noble Friend. Let us look, then, to the general tone and spirit of the observations which I made; for I admit that the tone and spirit in which a Minister speaks is the best indication of the animus and the intentions of a Government. Well, I spoke in a conciliatory spirit; but has my noble Friend acted in any other? Did he show any indisposition to receive a deputation from the New Zealand Company? Immediately after the debate was closed — after the reflections that were thrown upon my noble Friend—and after the imputations so liberally dealt on his conduct, he of course not having an opportunity to reply to them—I do not mean to say that that is any reason why they should not have been made—but after he had had an opportunity of reading those imputations, without having had an opportunity of replying to them, did my noble Friend show any indisposition to enter at once, three nights after the close of that debate, into friendly communication with the chosen deputies of the New Zealand Company, who were sent to confer with him? In order that such mistakes as had before occurred might not again occur, it was suggested that there should be minutes taken of the conversation, and that these minutes should be considered as records of what took place. Now, then, with respect to the tone and spirit of my noble Friend. My noble Friend had read to the deputation portions of the despatches he had just written; and in what terms were these despatches conceived? Alluding to the New Zealand Company and to their claim for land, my noble Friend writes as follows to Captain Grey:—

"In my despatch of the 13th instant, I adverted to the relations between Her Majesty's Government and the New Zealand Company. An early settlement of the pending question respecting the Company's claim to certain lands is of paramount importance towards an amicable adjustment of the affairs of the Colony; and it is far more necessary to take effectual steps for bringing that question to a final, and, if possible, a satisfactory conclusion, than to discuss questions of strict right, or to carry on an unprofitable controversy."

Now, what could a Minister say more? The hon. Gentleman opposite says, "I advise you to select an agent, to give him a general discretionary authority, and not to bind him down by particular instructions." What course has my noble Friend taken? He has appointed Captain Grey. But the hon. and learned Gentleman says, he thinks it would have been better to have taken a person of high rank from this country for that purpose. Now, the selection of Captain Grey was a most disinterested act. It was possible, if we had selected some person in England, and had given him a large salary, that we should have been charged with having converted this affair into a matter of patronage, and should have been reproached for not having appointed a gentleman, such as Captain Grey, who was at New South Wales, and, therefore, close at hand, and who was conversant with the interests of New Zealand, and not a stranger; and the expression would have been, "For God's sake, why not send Captain Grey?" If we are wrong in this—in thus sending Captain Grey—at least we have acted from no other motive than to settle the affairs of New Zealand in the speediest possible space of time. My noble Friend said, "Don't let us refer to the past, but let us bring the affair to a speedy and satisfactory settlement." But how does he conclude his despatch to Captain Grey? He says—

"I can only repeat the instructions which I have already given to Captain Fitzroy, to endeavour, by amicable co-operation with Colonel Wakefield, to remove obstacles arising from unsatisfied native claims, and to discourage, as far as lies in your power, any exorbitant or extortionate demands on the Company on this head."

These are the general instructions which my noble Friend has given to Captain Grey, and these instructions have been communicated frankly and unreservedly to the New Zealand Company. So much, then, for the general spirit of my speech. Now, with respect to the particular facts. The hon. and learned Gentleman says, I made declarations with respect to the future Government of New Zealand which were at variance with the instructions given by my noble Friend. [Mr. C. Buller: I never said that. What I said was, that those declarations had never been carried out.] Well, which are not carried out in the instructions. This is the main point between us. The hon. Member says that I, speaking in the House of Commons, and influencing it by my declaration, gave an assurance here which my noble Friend, writing a few days afterwards, did not substantially carry out. What did I say? I said generally that I thought with regard to these distant Colonies, a representative government was on the whole the best mode of conducting them; that I thought this country could have no object in possessing these Colonies, except to see them contented and prosperous, and that on the whole the best way of ensuring contentment and prosperity, as a general rule, was to establish a form of government in accordance with the views of the inhabitants. But I said that in the present state of society in New Zealand, looking at the dispersion of its inhabitants, and the distance of its settlements from each other, I thought it would be exceedingly difficult at once to give effect to the principle of representative government, if, by representative government you mean a popular assembly with extensive powers of general legislation and taxation. But the particular declaration which I made was this:—I said, it is quite clear that seeing how the settlers are spread over the Northern Island, it would be no easy matter to apply the principle of representative government according to the rule observed in more thickly-peopled countries; that I believed by far the best plan would be the formation of municipal institutions, with extensive powers of local taxation for local purposes. I said that I thought these municipal institutions might be the germ of future representative government; that I hoped such would be the case, but that the Colony was not now in a condition for a representative government in the sense in which we usually apply that word; but that I thought the best foundation for a future representative government would be the formation of municipal institutions, with extensive powers of local taxation for local purposes. That is the declaration which I made. What did my noble Friend write to Captain Grey? He says—

"There is another subject to which your attention will probably be directed, namely, that of a representative government in New Zealand. By a representative government, I mean the constitution of a legislative assembly with general power of legislation. I should be very glad if I could think it practicable in the present condition of the Colony to adopt this course: but the objections appear to me insuperable."

Here my noble Friend admits that he thinks the principle of representative government good, and regrets only that the circumstances of New Zealand prevent, for the present, its application. He says there are, above others, reasons which have reference to the distance of the settlements from each other, and the peculiar position of the native population; and, he says, "For these, among other reasons, I think the admission of the representative system for the present impracticable;" and my noble Friend then requests Captain Grey to direct his attention and that of the colonists to the formation of local municipal bodies with considerable powers of taxation for local purposes, and with the power of making the necessary by-laws, leaving the more general powers of legislation vested in the Council as at present constituted. Looking at the peculiar circumstances of New Zealand, he continues—

"I should not object to extend the authority of these local bodies over a considerable district of the surrounding country."

He stated, and I think the House will concur with him, that he wished to see these districts so extended as to take in a portion of the native population; but not in such numbers as to enable them in their present unenlightened state, by physical force, and by the force of numbers, to overbear the intelligent portion of the inhabitants; but to accustom them to the former, and privileges of representative government, and municipal institutions, by incorporating them, as far as you can, in these institutions, and by giving them equal privileges, and making them bear equal burdens. Does the House object to that? My noble Friend also stated his opinion, that in these bodies it would be found advisable to limit, as far as possible, so much of the burden of the Government expenditure as could fairly be considered of a local character, to the particular district, thus obviating the objections which might be urged by the inhabitants of distant districts, that they were taxed for the purpose of meeting expenditure in which they had no concern, and from which they derived no benefit. What, then, were the instructions of my noble Friend? That these institutions should have all the control over local taxation and expenditure which is compatible with the due exercise of the functions of the governing body. It is impossible that they should have supreme power. You must put some limitation, because you do not wish to have separate bodies with supreme powers. You do not wish to have one system of custom-house regulations in one settlement, and another system in another. You do not wish, I presume, to have one law for the succession to property in one part of the Colony, and another law in another. You do not wish to establish the law of primogeniture in one district, and destroy it in another. You want now and for ever to have one controlling supreme body, to whom the general powers of legislation must be entrusted. You wish to have one general body to whom general taxation for the support of the Government and the charge of the State shall be committed. That, I apprehend, is inevitable; but, in the mean time, constitute municipal institutions, widen the range of their authority, and commit to them as extensive powers, both of taxation and control, as is consistent with the authority of the supreme legislative body. How are these municipal bodies now constituted? I apprehend on as liberal a basis as any one would wish. I believe every male having arrived at the age of twenty-one years is entitled to vote. [Mr. Aglionby: That is not the case yet.] But a local law has passed regulating the franchise, and conferring it on every male inhabitant of the age of twenty-one. No one wants a more liberal constitution of municipal bodies than this. But the powers of taxation were limited; they were limited within far too narrow bounds. The hon. and learned Member says, these institutions give powers which are only sufficient for paving and lighting; and he asks whether such powers are suitable for Colonies in the position of New Zealand. Most certainly not. I will not define what local purposes are; but when you constitute these municipal institutions, you ought to constitute them on a liberal basis as to the franchise, with authority over as extensive districts as you can. You ought to secure to them every power of local taxation, with all the control over local expenditure which is compatible with the functions and authority of the Supreme Government—namely, the Governor in Council, as at present constituted. Sir, I apprehend that, in speaking of the existing constitution and members of the Council, I am not to be understood as implying that for all time to come seven members, four of them holding office and three not holding office, according to the instructions of my noble Friend—I mean the instructions given by the noble Lord who formerly held my noble Friend's office — instructions no doubt perfectly well suited to the state of society as it then existed—when I say that I think these municipal institutions will form the germ of a representative government—if you say that for all time to come this Council is to remain unchanged, I admit that such is not the germ of the representative government which I desire to see. But when you have municipal institutions it will be perfectly open to consideration whether you may not give a more extended and liberal character to the Council. Such is the spirit in which my noble Friend's instructions are conceived. How you are to constitute the Council I do not say; that, of course, must be an element for your consideration; but after you have constituted these bodies on extended and liberal representative principles — after you have committed to them powers of local taxation, my belief is, that it will be necessary to reconsider the constitution of the Council, and give it a power more consentaneous with municipal institutions. But what possible object can we have in so modifying the Council as to disentitle it to the confidence of those for whom it is to legislate? I think I have given a satisfactory explanation of the intention of my noble Friend. If the New Zealand Company had any objections to urge, why did they not state them? But not a word of objection was sent; and now this Motion is made in the House of Commons, and now, for the first time, these objections are brought forward. These were the intentions of my noble Friend in sending out these instructions; and I think it utterly impossible that any man, in the present state of the Colony, could have given more precise or more positive instructions. Instructions have been given which I could not, consistently with a sense of public duty, lay on the Table of the House. I could not run the risk of their being made known in the Colony before the arrival of the Governor; but the time will come when these instructions will be laid on the Table, and the House will then have an opportunity of seeing whether the imputations cast on my noble Friend with regard to his conduct towards the New Zealand Company are well founded or not. I speak under great difficulty in this respect, because the same objections apply now, as then, with regard to the production of those Papers. There are also despatches to Captain Fitzroy; but having removed him from office, we do not think it right to present them. These despatches, however, explicitly state on the part of my noble Friend the objections entertained with regard to his conduct, and the grounds upon which he felt called upon to advise his recall. These instructions will be in the hands of Captain Grey, and will serve as an indication to him of the policy of my noble Friend. I hope I have proved to the satisfaction of the House that I did not say one word with respect to the representative government, or the formation of municipal institutions, in which the instructions of my noble Friend do not both in the spirit and in the letter concur. I hope I have shown, that far from attempting to gain a majority by delusive assurances, I said not one word which has not been literally carried into execution by the instructions of my noble Friend. With respect to Auckland, I stated that, deterred by general considerations, I was not prepared to give any assurance that the seat of government should be transferred from thence. My noble Friend has given instructions with regard to Auckland in precise conformity with my declaration. With regard to the relation between the New Zealand Company and the Government, did I give any assurance at variance with the opinions expressed by my right hon. Friend? Did I say that the Treaty of Waitangi was not to be respected? What language did I hold with respect to that? I said, distinctly, that if the House affirmed that the Treaty of Waitangi enabled the Crown to dispossess the natives of all their land without full inquiry, they would, in my opinion, lower the character of this House in the estimation of all who respect the inviolability of public engagements. I said I thought nothing could be more unjust than if the House were to pass censure, or implied censure, on the conduct of my noble Friend, because he avowed his determination to carry honourably into effect the Treaty which had been made with the natives of New Zealand at Waitangi. I believe this is the point, and almost the only point, on which we are at issue. I believe that, after all the volumes of controversy which have appeared, the question really resolves itself into this; shall the Government undertake to guarantee, in this country, within certain limits in New Zealand, a certain amount of land, withough reference to the rights to that land vesting in the natives? [" No, no!"] If you mean to say that the Crown shall do all it can to possess the Company, through the intervention of local authorities, of that quantity of land to which they were entitled by the award of Mr. Pennington—if you say that the Government should give a liberal construction to the claims of the Company—that it should not remain indifferent—that it should exert itself by all legitimate means at the earliest possible period to enable the Company to obtain by legitimate means all the land they claim—if that be your meaning, there is no difference between us. But this I tell you distinctly we will not do; and if the House entertains a different opinion, it is but right that it should give expression to it. We will not undertake, in the absence of surveys and local information as to the claims of the natives, to assign to you 1,000,000 or any other number of acres, and dispossess the natives by the sword. [Mr. Aglionby: Nobody ever asked that.] I admit that the New Zealand Company has a fair right to expect from the Crown to be put in possession of the quantity of land awarded to them at as early a period and in as satisfactory a manner as possible, with this clear reserve, that you shall not violate a compact, or infringe the rights of private property. I say this entirely differing from the policy which dictated the course pursued in 1839, which I regard as a serious error. You should have rested your claim on the ground of discovery, and not on some cession by the natives. Acting on the Report of the Aborigines' Committee, you laid down a principle which has involved you in your present difficulty; and now you are trying to make us responsible for it. The hardness of the names connected with the subject indispose people to pay attention to it; but if you will listen but for a quarter of an hour, I will show that this difficulty is all of your own creating, and that if you seek to involve my noble Friend in censure for not violating this Treaty, you will commit an act of gross injustice towards him. The construction of these Treaties depends on the circumstances of the time when they were formed, the impression entertained by the Executive Governments and the legislative assemblies, and on the language which you instructed your Representative to hold. It may be all very well to say this Treaty was an improvident one, let us get possession of the land; but I tell you there are parties in New Zealand enemies to your authority, who know what passed in 1839, and the circumstances under which the British sovereignty was then established. I ask you to beware—first, from considerations of justice, and next by considerations of policy—how you take upon yourselves the responsibility of violating the engagements into which you have entered. I agree with the hon. Member for Bath, that the title derived from cession by the natives was unwise, liable to misconstruction, and, above all, that it is extremely difficult to show a right of sovereignty in this way unless you had the unanimous consent of the natives. But you must bear in mind what passed in 1839. Lord Normanby was then at the head of the Colonial Office. He sent out a certain naval officer named Hobson, entrusted him with diplomatic and executive functions, and gave him instructions. Will you tell me what those instructions were? I will read the words which a Secretary of State, six years ago, speaking in the name of the Crown, gave to on officer sent to represent Her Majesty. The letter is dated August 14, 1839, and is notorious among the natives in New Zealand, and it states that—

"The natives of New Zealand are a numerous and inoffensive people, whose title to the soil and sovereignty of New Zealand is indisputable."

What is meant by the soil? The Secretary of State says the title of the inhabitants to the soil of New Zealand is as perfect as their title to the sovereignty which has been solemnly recognised by the British Government. Solemly recognised! What is the meaning of this solemn recognition of the title of the natives to the soil? He says—

"We acknowledge New Zealand as a sovereign and independent State. The Queen disclaims for Herself and for her subjects any pretensions to seize on the islands of New Zealand, or to govern them as part of the dominions of Great Britain, unless a free and intelligent consent of the natives, expressed according to their usages, should be first obtained."

You now find these usages very absurd, the title to land derived by having eaten up the last incumbent, for instance; but the Secretary of State ought to have considered that before he disclaimed the right of his Sovereign to exercise dominion in New Zealand unless the free and intelligent consent of the natives should have been first obtained. So much for sovereignty. Lord Normanby proceeds—

"All dealing with the aborigines for their land must be conducted upon the same principle of sincerity, of justice, and of good faith as must govern your transactions with them for the recognition of Her Majesty's sovereignty in the island."

Observe, now, you did not claim the sovereignty by right of conquest or by that of discovery, but by the cession of the natives. Writing to your Representative there you say—

"It will be your duty to obtain, by fair and equitable contracts, the cession to the Crown of such lands as may be necessarily required for the occupation of the settlers."

Now, tell me what construction you will put upon those written proofs of your sovereignty? But when you said, "Get the sovereignty by cession, according to the usages of the aborigines, and only take the lands in the same way," what, I ask you again, is the construction that you put upon these engagements? Now, observe that Lord Normanby says again—

"To the natives or their chiefs much of the land of the country is of no actual use, and in their hands it possesses scarcely any exchangeable value."

But first he tells you to "take no land except that which is by cession fairly granted." He further tells you that "you must be cautious that you do not take any land even by fair cession, if it could be considered that the taking of such land would interfere with their rights." These were the instructions which were given by the Secretary of State for the Colonies only about six years since, and in consequence of these instructions you formed a Treaty to this effect:—

"On account of acquiring sovereignty by cession, Her Majesty the Queen of England confirms and grants to the chiefs and tribes of New Zealand, and to their respective families, the full, exclusive, undisturbed possession of their lands, forests, habitations and other property which they may collectively or individually possess, as long as they may wish or desire to retain possession of them."

Now, my noble Friend had argued that the Crown, by proclamation, had claimed the right of pre-emption from the natives, as we admitted only a qualified right on their part; but we claimed the right of pre-emption because those lands were ceded to the Crown by the Treaty of Waitangi. The Treaty goes on to say—

"The native tribes and individual chiefs give to Her Majesty the exclusive right of pre-emption over such land as may be disposed of at such prices as the persons appointed on behalf of the two parties may think fair and reasonable."

The argument, therefore, of my noble Friend falls to the ground in respect to this point of pre-emption. The Crown claims a right of pre-emption, because the right of pre-emption is ceded to the Crown by the Treaty of Waitangi. These are the public engagements which you have entered into. You have stipulated on the part of the Crown that, as the price and condition of your possession of sovereignty, the natives should not be called upon to relinquish their lands except by a fair cession, and for a fair equivalent. Now, my noble Friend does not contend that there necessarily is on the part of the native chiefs and tribes a claim to the whole of the waste lands in New Zealand; but after this engagement which you have deliberately entered into with them, he thinks that the rights of the natives ought to be clearly ascertained before you can enter into a consideration as to what those particular waste lands are which the Crown may lay claim to. I consider that the right of sovereignty which has been ceded by the natives gives to the Crown the perfect right of possession over all lands which the native tribes cannot lay a perfect claim to; but the tribes cannot, according to their usages, establish a right of property to certain waste lands. I admit your interest in these lands by the engagement entered into between the Crown and the natives—I admit the importance, too, of your future interests in the Colony—I admit the great advantage it would be if you could induce these natives to relinquish, by fair cession, some of these lands—I admit that to accomplish so desirable a result that every effort on our part ought to be made. But if, as I think it is, the question be, whether the Crown shall, upon its own responsibility, undertake to dispossess, by force, and against the will of the inhabitants, the natives from certain lands desired by the New Zealand Company, let us, then, have no mistake upon the point; for you shall not say that I am deceiving you. I tell you at once that we are not prepared to give you any such assurance. Sir, this is the spirit in which we shall meet the question—the same spirit that actuated us in the former discussion of this subject—and which influences me when speaking again upon it. I speak not in a spirit of hostility to the New Zealand Company, but with a sincere desire to see that Company restored to prosperity, and Her Majesty's Government acting in concert and co-operating with it. But to gain that concert and co-operation, I will not do that which I believe to be inconsistent with public faith, which I admit was unwisely pledged to the natives of New Zealand. I admit this, Sir; but, at the same time, I think that you are bound to observe it, however weak these natives be. Considerations of justice ought to induce you to respect that weakness. But you admit that the natives are possessed of great powers. Considerations, then, of mere policy must at once induce you to maintain peace with them, rather than come to the determination of dispossessing them of any grounds which they lay claim to, by an exercise of physical force. I do not say that this argument I should have greater reliance upon, than upon your desire faithfully and honourably to perform those public engagements into which you have deliberately entered with them. I do not mean this in the mere technical definition of the words. I cannot have a doubt but that you have a power to overbear any force that could be brought against you in New Zealand; but I think that you should rather regard the settlement of this question by cordial and friendly relations, than that you should trust to force and physical strength to overcome your difficulties. Depend on it that the seeds of future government in New Zealand would be very imperfectly laid, and will come to no head or satisfactory maturity, unless you do respect not only the principles of justice, but also unless you bear in mind the natural feelings of the native population. Instead, then, of taking that course which has been taken in regard to other Colonies, you should try and incorporate the natives of New Zealand with your own institutions, and, as far as possible, to amalgamate the two countries, and connect them together by deeds of reciprocal kindness. Observe the course which France has taken in Algiers. Recollect that in India you have respected the rights of native tribes to the land. You have, I apprehend, contented yourself with the sovereignty you have there obtained; I think you ought to content yourself with the sovereignty here, and with the title to all that land to which the sovereignty lays claim. But even if there be some further demands made by you, you should try to obtain them by fair cession and equitable arrangement, rather than seek to obtain them by unequitable determination. Sir, I hope I have said nothing to give dissatisfaction to the hon. and learned Gentleman. Upon this second debate, and upon this second appeal, I trust the difference between the Company and Government has not been widened. I feel that I have said nothing that can involve me in any such responsibility. I hope that I have cautiously avoided recrimination or partial proceedings, and have only contented myself with that vindication which I felt it necessary to offer against a most unjust attack that has been made upon my noble Friend. I state fairly to the House the course we are prepared to take—I state that to the House of Commons. It is, of course, for them to determine whether they shall adopt an opinion adverse to that. I also say that you shall not succeed in establishing between my noble Friend and myself any distinction, for my own opinions in respect to the future policy of New Zealand meet with my noble Friend's entire concurrence. The language which I have now uttered is language which, had he been here, he would have himself uttered, but with much greater force. His desires of fulfilling the assurances which I have given (not without having a conference with my noble Friend) are equally great as mine. I will not do that which the New Zealand Company seem to think I might do—undertake to supersede, in the discharge of his proper functions, a Minister who I believe has discharged his official duties with almost unexampled ability, and with a sincere desire to promote the interests of every Colony over which he now presides.

Mr. Roebuck wished to say a few words to remove an unfounded impression from the mind of a gentleman who had addressed himself to him in very courteous terms. He stated that he had charged him with exercising a paramount influence in the Colonial Office, and with being himself at the bidding of the Missionary Society. What he did say was this—that from the necessity of that gentleman's position he exercised an influence in the Colonial Office — that it required very peculiar power on the part of any person coming to that office to avoid being subject to that influence — that he believed the person holding the seals of that Department at the present moment was not proof against such influence—and that therefore the responsible officer was, in reality, under an irresponsible officer. If he had imputed to the gentleman the suspicion of sorcery, it was only of that description which was implied in the power of a strong mind over a weak one. That was no imputation on the honour of the gentleman. That gentleman had stated that he had charged him with being at the bidding of the Missionary Society. Not at all. What he said was this—that having this influence he had adopted a line of policy in consequence of a certain feeling on his part that the Missionary Societies were doing great good in that part of the world. That he thought he was mistaken; he thought, therefore, his policy was wrong, but he never intended to say he was at the bidding of anybody, but merely that he obeyed the impulse of his own mind, which led him to a wrong conclusion.

Lord John Russell: Before entering on the question which is immediately before the House, I think it is due to a gentleman, whose name has been mentioned both by the hon. and learned Member for Bath, and by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and by a right hon. Friend of mine, the Member for Taunton, to give my testimony as to the conduct of that gentleman as an officer in the public service. Now, Sir, my experience of that gentleman can only be an addition to the knowledge which the House has of his powerful talents, of his various acquisitions, of his long experience in all matters of Colonial government. Those, I say, are qualifications which no one will deny to Mr. Stephen; but it is said, and the hon. and learned Gentleman declaring that he means no personal offence to Mr. Stephen, seems to repeat the charge, that he does use his powerful talents to exercise undue influence over the Principal of the Department in which he is placed, and that he himself is biassed by the Missionary Society in this country. [Mr. Roebuck: I did not say that he exercised undue influence over his principal.] I understand the hon. and learned Gentleman to interrupt me by saying that he did not use the expression, that Mr. Stephen exercised undue influence over the mind of his principal. Now, my only testimony is, that a person with such qualifications as I have mentioned, when found in office by any person who may be placed at the head of that office, must naturally be consulted by such person, if he has any fitness for the office to which he has been appointed. That the views and opinions of Mr. Stephen may have more or less of influence, must depend on the views which the Secretary of State takes. All I can say is, that I always found, while Mr. Stephen was ready to give any information as to facts—to give any information as to past regulations of former Secretaries of State, or as to laws bearing on the subject—he was always most unwilling, unless asked, to give his opinion as to what should be the general course of the Government on any subject. When asked, he would not refrain—it was his duty not to refrain from stating that opinion. Such opinion, as far as regards myself, I always endeavoured to weigh carefully, considering the source whence it came, and the arguments by which it was sure to be supported; but always with the independent resolution in my own mind, that if I thought the result to which those arguments led, was not such as would be conducive to the welfare of the Colony in question, or of the Empire, that I was bound to adopt exactly opposite conclusions, or a conclusion at variance with that of Mr. Stephen, as much as of any private individual with whom I might happen to differ. And, therefore, concluding of others as of myself, I should say that the notion generally entertained that everything is done by Mr. Stephen in the Colonial Office, is unfounded; and it arises solely from the known abilities of that gentleman, and the supposition that they must have predominant weight in the counsels of any office in which he happens to be placed. I will say further, that when he intimated to me his wish to retire from that office, and be placed in some other situation under the Crown, I immediately represented that fact to Lord Melbourne, and induced him, in agreement with me, to beg Mr. Stephen to remain in the office in which he was, on the ground that the public service would seriously suffer, if deprived of his aid. [Sir R. Peel: The same thing has lately taken place.] I understand from the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Peel), that the present Government take the same view of Mr. Stephen's services that Lord Melbourne and I took; and it must be a strange fascination, honourable to Mr. Stephen, if, without real and substantial merits, he can induce all those who are placed in office over him to take such a view of his merits and services. Now, Sir, I will deal with the question before the House. That question, I think, has been made in this, as in the former debate, too much of a personal matter between the Secretary of State and the New Zealand Company. I regret that that has been the main topic—I regret that the Attorney General wasted, I should say, the whole of his speech in a controversy as to the merits of these two parties. But when the right hon. Gentleman says that my hon. and learned Friend near me is responsible for bringing on the question a second time at this period of the year, I, on the contrary, rather take blame to myself, that I did not either myself take the sense of the House, or induce others, at an early period of the Session, to take the sense of the House, on the government of New Zealand, which, in my opinion, and in the opinion of many others, could not but end in disaster. I did hope—and that was my reason for refraining—that the New Zealand Company, being in communication with the Secretary of State, and representing a large body of settlers in that Colony, might at length induce him to take a juster view of the interests of the colonists; and that we should not be obliged, by an adverse debate, to force from the Minister adverse arguments against what I conceived the interests of the Colony. But when the matter comes to be debated here—and debated a second time—I must say, putting out of view altogether the interests of the Company—putting out of view any agreement they had made with me—there is this great question to be considered, upon which my hon. and learned Friend asked you to give an opinion, namely, whether or not the condition of the Colony of New Zealand does excite serious apprehension? And, in the second place, whether that apprehension is aggravated by the evidence, that there is no change in the policy which has led to those disastrous results? That, Sir, is a question which, putting aside the Company—putting aside any loss of their capital—putting aside the very question of their existence as a Company—that, I say, is a question interesting to the people of this country—interesting to the settlers who have gone out there—and interesting to those who purpose becoming emigrants to any of our Colonies in any part of the world. That is a question totally independent of the Company, upon which the House of Commons may fairly be called upon to give an opinion. It is a question upon which I think it is now desirable to ask for the opinion of this House. Let me, in the first place, ask what led to the late disasters? What has led to this, but the conduct of the Governor, who was appointed by the present Secretary of State? What has led to it, but the serious errors which he has committed? What has led to it, but his continual concessions to the natives, who attributed such concessions to fear and weakness; and who, after having by intimidation forced one concession after another from him, at length thought, by further outrage, and by further intimidation, they should entirely destroy the sovereignty of the Queen in New Zealand? Why, Sir, I have a letter here, among the Papers printed in the early part of the Session, in which this very chief, who has attacked and destroyed one of our settlements in New Zealand, is addressed as friend Heki Poki by Captain Fitzroy, the Governor, and in which he tells him that the Governor has made certain regulations; but he says these regulations would not please greedy Europeans, who wanted to get all the best lands. Now, when a Governor, who is sent out from this country with the Queen's authority—who is sent out in the name of the Queen of England—talks of greedy Europeans, and thus incites a barbarous chieftain to think he is their friend, and opposed to the Europeans—not pointing out any particular Europeans, but speaking of Europeans generally, as persons greedy of land, and wishing to act unjustly by the natives—what could be more natural than that this barbarous chief should conclude that, from some motive or other, the Governor would always act in his favour; and that he had nothing to but to apply force more and more, until he had forced the whole sovereignty away from such a timid and incapable Governor? Well, it is said, that Captain Fitzroy is recalled; that he is separated from this friend of his, for whose apprehension he was afterwards obliged to offer a reward; but that does not relieve the Government from their responsibility. He was the person whom they thought most fit to govern that Colony; and I say, if you have removed that Governor, give us a proof that you have changed the policy that led to the late disasters, by which we may think that such disasters will not occur again. Has there been anything communicated to the House to show there is that change in your policy—to show that a tone of greater firmness is to be taken—that the extravagant pretensions of the natives will meet with a due check? Has there been anything communicated to the House to show that you do mean really to assert the Queen's authority—to show that you do not mean to pamper every extravagance which the natives of such a country would be capable of forming, and that you will not yield repeatedly to those pretensions, until at last it will end in a scene of bloodshed, and not only much British blood will be shed in such a contest, but the whole Colony itself will be a scene of disaster such as is scarcely to be found in any former Colony of the British Crown? Have you done anything of this sort? The policy which you have pursued having been notoriously the cause of this disaster, having been the cause of the loss of British lives, have you said anything from which we can suppose there will be a better course of policy in future? This is not a question for the New Zealand Company to dispute with the Secretary of State; but it is a question of supreme importance to the good government of the Colony, and the welfare of the British Empire; and it behoves the House of Commons to consider it. If the House of Commons should be of opinion, that the Government have so changed their policy, that they have laid down rules for a wise policy in future, then let them put their negative upon the Motion of my hon. and learned Friend; let them decide that there are reasonable grounds for expecting, under the present Executive Government at home, a better course of policy towards New Zealand, which shall lead to the future prosperity of that Colony, and then let them acquit the Government of all blame. But has the right hon. Gentleman proved that to be the case? I think his speech to-night is less satisfactory than his former speech. I thought his former speech contained a stronger assurance as to the future government of the Colony, than his present speech; and that for a very good reason. He now tells us, that he is speaking in complete concurrence with, and with the authority of the Secretary of State for the Colonies; but, as far as I could perceive, when he was speaking on a former occasion, he was giving the result of his own reflections—of his own opinion—as to the government of that Colony; and it was a much sounder opinion than any which he is likely to form after a conference with the Secretary for the Colonies, who has been, for the last three or four years, in controversy with the New Zealand Company, and who cannot conceive anything to be right which is done in New Zealand, unless done by him, and in opposition to the Company. The question is so blended in his mind, that it is impossible he can come to a right conclusion on this subject. If it should be a conclusion tending to the prosperity of New Zealand, giving consolation and tranquillity to the relatives of all the settlers who are out there, if he believed it to be so, he might not object to it; but as it would be a conclusion in favour of the Company, he never would adopt it, he never would see matters in that light. What is it that the right hon. Gentleman tells us, after this concert, and speaking by this authority—what is it he tells with regard to the two great questions, which in an infant Colony, must be of paramount importance—first, as to the form of government; and, secondly, as to the purchase of land? These are the only topics upon which I will at this hour trouble the House. With regard to the form of government, I can hardly treat that question properly without referring to the instructions given in December, 1840, to the Governor of New Zealand; for the right hon. Gentleman speaks of municipal institutions as if it was an entirely new notion which had occurred to the present Government, that it would be a good thing to have municipal institutions applied to larger districts than the mere tow nsBut what I ask of the Government is, what have they done from September 1841 to July 1845, to promote the prosperity of this young Colony? I have a fair right to ask, whether we have seen that Colony make such progress as we might expect—whether we have seen it increase in wealth—whether we have seen it increase in the number of its inhabitants—and whether it bears all the evidence of an increasing and improving Colony? One of the first instructions that I gave to the Governor of the Colony contained these words :—

"Another important rule for your guidance, is to promote, as far as possible, the establishment of municipal and district governments for the conduct of local affairs, such as drainages, by-roads, police, the erecting and repair of local prisons, court-houses, and the like. Independently of the excellent uses of such institutions, regarded in a political light, there are none more consonant with the English character and habits, and none better calculated to an efficient and frugal expenditure of public money. It is of the utmost importance to withdraw from the Governor the care of these innumerable local petty details, and to relieve the public treasury from the wasteful expenditure in which it must be involved, so long as it is burdened with the double charge of collecting local assessments, and of effecting local works. Nor is there any better mode of training the colonists to the exercise of the more important duties of a free people, and a representative government."

Now, I ask, what municipal charters have been established by the present Government—what settlements are there in New Zealand governed by municipal institutions? Have there been any such formed? Has anything whatever, in fact, been done in that respect from 1841 to 1845? I believe there has not; and now that you are about to send out new instructions, I say that these instructions for 1845 fall lamentably short of what they ought to be. My opinion, perhaps, in this respect, goes beyond that of some others, as to what would give effect to the government of the Colony. I think you should not only have these district and municipal institutions in the towns where settlements now exist, but I think that there should be persons called from these towns to consult with the Legislative Council for the purpose of legislation. I think that the Council which has been formed has not proved itself sufficient for the purpose for which it was constituted, and I say it ought to be strengthened by some delegations from those municipal bodies. It would thus have greater influence, greater wisdom, and greater strength for the purposes of taxation. And, besides, it would be in accordance with the principle of the British Constitution. That, let us never forget, is the principle of the BritishConstitution—a principle, too, asserted in very unfavourable times by a statesman who holds no trifling place in English history; I allude to the discussion which is recorded in the Appendix to Fox's History with regard to the government of New England in 1685. It was in the latter days of the reign of Charles II., and in the Council of the King it was discussed whether the Charter of New England, having been forfeited to the Crown, they should establish an arbitrary government in the Colony, or grant it a representative constitution. On that occasion, Lord Halifax declared that it was repugnant to all the feelings of Englishmen, that there should be any authority to tax, which did not derive its authority to do so from the people, and that, therefore, he maintained that there should be no government having a power of taxing the people, which did not derive that power from the people themselves. He said—

"I would not bear that any man should have the power of taking money out of my pocket except I gave him authority so to do."

That was the opinion of that great man. It was an opinion that did not coincide with the feelings of the majority of the Council, and it was no wonder Barillon, who combated strongly against it, should have generally prevailed. I think you ought to take the first opportunity that offered itself of showing your adherence to the great constitutional principle I have just quoted. It seems to me that this is an opportunity fitted for the purpose, and that you should take advantage of it, at least, to indicate somewhat of the force and efficacy of representative institutions; and I am confirmed in the opinion of this being the proper moment for doing so, from perceiving the weakness of the present Legislative Council, from seeing their acts, and the total want of confidence which the settlers of New Zealand, very naturally, I think, exhibit towards them. But I ask, has that anything to do with the New Zealand Company? Has it anything to do either with the mistakes or the virtues, whichever they may be, of the Company? Is it not clear that it has not, and that it is a question on which the settlers of New Zealand have a right to ask for the attention of the Executive Government? Or, I ask, is it a question on which this House should be indifferent—this House, which derives its authority from representative institutions? And, I ask, too, is my hon. and learned Friend so greatly to blame—is he a person so deeply responsible as has been alleged, because he ventures to say in the House of Commons, with regard to a British Colony—with regard to 12,000 British subjects settled there—that he thinks even in New Zealand the principles of representative government ought to be respected. These are the observations that I have to make on your decision, as far as municipal institutions in the Colony are concerned; and the opinion which I am forced to adopt is, that you have rather gone back than gone forward in your government of New Zealand, during the last four or five years. Lord Stanley has given reasons in his memorandum for not granting representative institutions. He says, that it is impossible to give the franchise to the natives; and that it would be unjust to govern them without giving the franchise to them. Now, unless we can suppose the entire native race to be annihilated in a few years, we have here an argument against any representative government for the next century. It is all very well for the Government to say, with regard to this, as to many other subjects, that the principle is highly to be recommended. Nothing is more desirable than representative government. It is a thing we all admire, and there is nothing we will not say in its favour; but, at the same time, there is nothing that we will do for it. If you ask us to pronounce a panegyric upon representative government, we are ready to do so in the most beautiful language, and most highly-coloured terms; but as to granting such a system to the settler in New Zealand, or to his son born three months ago, that is a thing that we cannot think of. I then come to the other important question, which is the question of land. The right hon. Baronet referred to what we had done in 1839, and stated that much of the mischief which has since been done, originated in the steps then taken. Now, the view which was taken in 1839, depended, in a great degree, on the view which had been adopted in 1831 and 1832. At that time, the New Zealanders were acknowledged as an independent nation. Their flag was recognised, and their independence admitted, by the Crown of this country. Now, that may have been a wise or a foolish step; but after it had been taken, I do not think we could have gone on claiming these islands, on the ground of the right of prior discovery. I think that any one succeeding Lord Ripon as Secretary of State, must have acted on the view which that nobleman had taken of the subject. A noble Friend of mine, a man of great and powerful talents, who now bears a title which will be ever memorable in English history—my noble Friend who so lately sat in this House, and who has succeeded to a name which it will be difficult worthily to bear—stated with that candour which belongs to him, that though in office at that time, he did not approve of the steps that had been then taken. But these are matters of difficulty, on which any man in subsequent years, and with increased experience, might well change his opinion. It might be open to Her Majesty's Government to set aside all former Acts, and to declare that they did not acknowledge any independent tribes in the country. But these tribes had, by the Treaty of Waitangi, acknowledged the sovereignty of the Crown of these realms, though, at the same time, they provided that they should be left in possession of all their lands, forests, and fisheries. On a former occasion, I alluded to the effect of that Treaty. It is, therefore, sufficient for me now to say that the sense which I then attached to the Treaty, I had attached to it within a month after I received the account of its being executed; and this assertion I make on the authority of Papers that have been laid on the Table of the House. I stated, at that time, that the title of the natives was to be acknowledged in all lands in their enjoyment or occupation; and that is the sense which I always continued to attach to the terms of the Treaty, and which I have since then repeated more than once. And not only was that the sense attached to the Treaty by me, being, as I then was, in immediate communication with my noble Friend the Marquess of Normanby, whose responsibility I am quite willing to share; but it was also the sense in which the Treaty was viewed by the great majority of this House—a majority not agreeing in politics with myself, but being many of them supporters of the right hon. Baronet. On the Motion of the noble Lord (Lord Francis Egerton) this House declared that they viewed the Treaty in the sense in which I now regard it; and that the other sense which was contended for was not necessary to its true construction. If that be the case, do not tell me, that this plain matter of fact resolves itself into the proposition put by the right hon. Gentleman, as far as we can know his opinion, from his report of the sentiments of Lord Stanley —that "here is a plain Treaty, and will the House of Commons or House of Lords ask us to violate the terms of it—to violate the solemn engagements of the Crown?" I say, that is not the question. The question to be decided is, what the sense is that is to be attached to the Treaty? What is the true interpretation to be given to it? If I wanted farther argument on that point, I would find it in what we had been told the other day by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), that the true construction of the Treaty of Utrecht was not that which appeared on the face of it, but a totally different construction. Of this I am sure, that if you attach the construction now sought to be put upon this Treaty by Her Majesty's Government, you will be doing that which has never before been done. The noble Lord at the head of the Colonial Office may say that the greater part of these waste lands are as much private property as are the Highlands of Scotland. Is there the least resemblance between the two? Commissioner Spain said that in the Middle Island there were millions of acres available for the purposes of cultivation on which human foot had never trod. Here in this island, as large as England, inhabited by about 1,500 members of a savage tribe, was there anything resembling the Highlands of Scotland? You must take one of two courses in this case. You must say that New Zealand shall be treated as inhabited by a civilized people; and then, as at the Cape of Good Hope or any other ceded Colony, declare the vast tracts of waste land are vested in the Crown, and which it alone can dispose of; or you must treat the people of that country as Sir George Gipps did the natives in a neighbouring Colony, and must apply the principle of Vattel, who alleged that savages could only hold the land they occupied, and beyond that they should have no favour whatever. Perhaps these people rather more nearly approach to civilization, and have a little more knowledge of government than other savages; but it is too much to say that they should be regarded as civilized people. Sir G. Gipps said that they had no knowledge of what they were about in their dealings with land; and he mentions the instance of some of them who sold a vast tract of land, upwards of 20,000 acres, to Mr. Wentworth, which that gentleman purchased of them at the eighth part of a farthing an acre. What possible resemblance is there between their alleged ownership of these lands, and that of the extensive possessions of the Duke of Gordon or Duke of Argyle in the Highlands? Is there any possible analogy between them? The whole of these lands must be vested in the Crown; and in all cases where you find such instances of savages, deal with them as Sir G. Gipps did. What has passed to-night, indeed, gives a hope for the future, for the Colonial Secretary has endeavoured to establish a principle which has never been heard of by a civilized people; a principle which neither in a territory occupied by a civilized people, nor in a territory inhabited by savages, has ever hitherto been thought of by a Minister of the Crown. The noble Lord's principle was this. They owned all these lands; no settler, therefore, could obtain a grant of land fairly from the Crown. If a person proposed to go out of this country, not to Auckland or other part less disturbed, and asked a grant of land from the Crown, he would not obtain it, because he would be told nearly all of it belonged to the savage tribes. But, then, there was another way which had been pointed out; it was, that there should be a mediation—that the Commissioner, Mr. Spain, should mediate between those savage tribes and the New Zealand Company or their settlers. Now, if that was to be an award in the way in which it was usually understood—that there were arbitrators to be appointed, that the two parties asked these arbitrators to decide between them, and agreed that their award should be final, that would afford some ground for thinking that there might be a settlement of the question; that might induce some people to say, on looking over the map of the world, "I won't go and settle in Canada; I won't go and settle in South Australia or Port Louis; but I will try my fortune in New Zealand." But when they came to ask, however, what this was, they would be told that the arbitrator was to decide that a certain sum, say a sum of 300*l.*, was to be paid to certain savage tribes for so much land; but after he had decided this, the noble Lord said, "I must be fully satisfied that these savages are content with that award!" And everybody knew how difficult it was to satisfy their minds. The House knew that after Mr. Commissioner Spain had made certain of these awards, they were not accepted by the Government. They knew that various tribes had different claims. One head of the tribe came and received a certain sum of money, and said, "I am satisfied;" but presently came another chief, and said, "That tribe had no right whatever, because I invaded that territory; I destroyed, I murdered, the father and mother, the brothers, and sisters of that chief; and, therefore, I have the preferable claim, and it is me you are to satisfy." Then there would be fresh objections again, and no settler would have the least security, or the least foundation to go upon, that any of the land would be granted to him according to that award. Well, then, with regard to that question which he had just mentioned to the House, was not the case this—that any persons in this country, instead of going either to the New Zealand Company or to the Government, or to the Emigration Commissioners, and saying, "I should like to go out, and 300 men with me, and I should take some capital with me, and here are ten or fifteen others who have considerable capital who will go with me, and we hope to form a flourishing settlement in New Zealand;" instead of saying that, would they not go to the Emigration Commissioners and say, "Can you tell us how we can get land in Canada West, or Canada East, or South Australia, or Van Diemen's Land, or Port Philip; only of all places, I will not buy land in New Zealand? There is no confidence to be placed in the Government which is there established. There is no confidence to be placed in the instructions of the Colonial Secretary." Would that or would it not be the fact for a considerable period to come? Is not this a fact worthy the consideration of the House? I can conceive Captain Grey disregarding his instructions, and, in a better spirit than was manifested at home, determine not to carry them out—although he knew that this might be attended with his recall—but in a patriotic spirit would act so as to secure the welfare of the Colony, and as his judgment would dictate to him, to arrest the mischief which threatens it. He must treat the natives with kindness; but not in a way to appear to be frightened into submission to them; he must prevent any acts of oppression towards them; he must also treat the settlers with kindness and protect their rights. For them, and for the promotion of their interests, he is bound to sacrifice his time, his reputation, and, if necessary, his life. It is certainly possible that Captain Grey, acting with great judgment, and condemning the proceeding of the Secretary of State, and acting as a friend to the islands of New Zealand, may be the instrument of saving the Colony. But this is a chance which we have no right to expect. Well, then, what is the question before the House? Is it a question solely as to New Zealand, and is the House to act at once on its own unbiassed opinion, and as persons out of doors act, quite irrespective of party considerations? If this should be the case, the House will at once say that the policy pursued towards New Zealand is monstrous, and must be abandoned. But, when we come to consider this question here, it is treated as a question of party politics; and when the right hon. Baronet says that he identifies himself with the Secretary of State, and calls upon the House to concur with him, no doubt New Zealand will be sacrificed, and party interests will be regarded. But the time will come when the right hon. Gentleman will be obliged to change his policy with respect to this Colony, as he was obliged to change it with regard to matters nearer home. I recollect that the noble Lord, whose conduct I now call in question, was instrumental in bringing in a Bill intended to affect the government of a most important part of the Empire, and which dealt with the elective franchise for that purpose; and by his plan the whole of the people were to be placed at the mercy of a small part of the landlords. This was the great measure of his policy towards that part of the Empire, and it was your policy then to support him. Did you persevere in this policy? The right hon. Gentleman, when he came into office, said that such a measure would be most unjust, and that he would not sanction a measure of such injustice; although he had formerly supported it. As for the taunts with respect to New Zealand, the change of policy may not come so soon. The subject may be trifled with for some time, as there will not be vast multitudes assembled, such as affected your policy towards another part of the kingdom; but, depend upon it, the time will come when the right hon. Gentleman, acting on the convictions of his own mind, will determine not to sacrifice an important Colony to feelings of pique and pride; but will resolve that New Zealand must be governed according to the principles of common sense. But, in the mean time, you expose the Colony to the greatest risks; if you agree to-night, that nothing shall now be done, you will impose the task on individual Members to bring Motions forward on this subject, till the House is prepared to act in a better spirit, and then the Colony of New Zealand will expand in a way which many of its most ardent friends did not contemplate.

Mr. G. W. Hope, in explanation, said that on the first occasion that he had addressed the House, he stated distinctly that one of the grounds of Captain Fitzroy's recall was his conduct — his want of firmness — towards the natives in the first proceedings in the Bay of Islands in September last.

The House divided on the Question, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:—Ayes 155; Noes 89: Majority 66.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Order of the Day for the House to go into a Committee of Supply read, and the Committee deferred.

House adjourned at a quarter after one.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, July 24, 1845.

MINUTES.] Sat First—The Lord Churchill, after the Death of his Father.

BILLS. Public.—1ª. Stamp Duties; Coal Trade, Port of London; Fees, Criminal Courts; Testamentary Disposition; Militia Pay; Lunatics; Lunatic Asylums and Pauper Lunatics.

2ª. Lunatic Asylums and Pauper Lunatics; Commons' Inclosure; Merchant Seamen; Lunatic Asylums (Ireland); Fisheries (Ireland); Drainage (Ireland); Unclaimed Stock and Dividends; Spirits (Ireland); Excise Duties on Spirits (Channel Islands).

Reported.—Geological Survey.

3ª. and passed:—Art Unions; Unlawful Oaths (Ireland); Turnpike Acts Continuance; Militia Ballots Suspension; Colleges (Ireland).

Private.—1ª. Duddeston and Nechells Improvement; Darby Court (Westminster); Manchester and Leeds Railway; London and Croydon Railway Enlargement; Grimsby Docks.

2ª. Gravesend and Rochester Railway; South Eastern Railway (Greenwich Extension); Rothwell Prison.

Reported.—Irish Great Western Railway (Dublin to Galway); Severn's Estate; Yoker Road (No. 2); Shrewsbury and Holyhead Road.

3ª. and passed:—Cromford Canal.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. From Magistrates and others, of Ayr, for Adopting certain suggestions relating to the Poor Law Amendment (Scotland) Bill.—From Trustees of Tewkesbury Severn Bridge and Roads, praying that the Exemption granted to Carriages and Horses conveying the Mails in the General Turnpike Acts may be repealed.—From Tottenham, for the re-insertion of a Clause in the Field Gardens Bill.

GUILDFORD AND CHICHESTER RAILWAY.] The Duke of Richmond presented petitions from the promoters of the Guildford, Chichester, and Portsmouth Junction Railway Bill, complaining that they had not been allowed a hearing by the Select Committee of their Lordships' House, now sitting on the Portsmouth Railway projects. There had been three Bills referred to one Committee; and the petitioners complained that they were not allowed by the Committee to be heard against the Atmospheric, or Direct Portsmouth Line. He begged to move that the petition be referred to the Committee for consideration.

The Earl of Hardwicke said, the Committee were anxious to discuss the case in all its bearings, and with the most mature deliberation; but having found a clause in one of the Bills consenting to a junction between the petitioners' line and another line, the Committee felt that they had no alternative but to act as they had done; as otherwise they would be permitting the petitioners to oppose what might be regarded as their own line.

Lord Brougham said, he thought the House ought to feel great delicacy in interfering with any of their Committees, while the inquiries which those Committees were delegated to make were still pending. But after the Report of a Committee was presented, it would, of course, be quite open to any noble Lord to bring forward a Motion on the subject of the manner in which that Committee had discharged its duties, and to require that the Report be sent back for reconsideration.

The Earl of Ellenborough said, he had intended to express the precise opinion which had fallen from his noble and learned Friend. He did not think any discussion should take place on the subject of the petition, until the Committee had made their Report.

The Duke of Richmond said, he had only moved that the petition be referred to the Committee. He felt so strongly on the necessity of no party being decided against without a hearing, that he would be under the necessity of moving that the Report be recommitted, should the Committee persevere in not permitting the petitioners to be heard.

Petitions read, and referred to the Select Committee on the Bills, but without leave to be heard.

IRISH GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY BILL—PRIVILEGE.] Earl Bathurst brought forward the Report of the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the charges brought against the Irish Great Western (Dublin and Galway) Railway Company. The Committee reported that they had met and considered the petitions which had been referred to them, and had heard counsel, and had examined witnesses in support of the allegations in the said petitions; and upon a perusal of the minutes of evidence, and a consideration of the whole case, the Committee were of opinion, that most systematic frauds had been used for the purpose of obtaining the necessary number of signatures to the subscription contract; that no attention appeared to have been paid to a proper distribution of the letters of allotment; that unauthorized names had been inserted in the contract, and false addresses given; and that packets of letters were proved to have been sent down to country postmasters, being applications for shares, with a request that they might be returned to London through the Post Office. It also appeared that a petition was presented to the House of Commons, but it was not prosecuted; a sum of 250*l.* being paid down to the petitioners, with a promise of a further sum of 500*l.* on the Bill passing the Standing Orders' Committee. Sufficient evidence was also produced to satisfy the Committee, that the subscription contract was not entered into bonâ fide, and the estimated cost of the undertaking was a false one. The Report concluded by stating, that the result of their inquiry had induced the Committee to express their entire concurrence in the Report of another Select Committee of their Lordships' House, that the decision come to by the House of Commons last Session, reducing the amount of deposit money required, had the effect of facilitating the commission of fraud; and that the Committee had, under these circumstances, not thought it necessary to proceed with the consideration of all the allegations contained in the petition of James Pim, jun., or to inquire into the merits of the Bill, without further instructions from the House.

The Earl of Besborough said, the Report was a very peculiar one; and he thought it better to give Notice respecting it, that he would move to-morrow (this day) that the Bill should not be further proceeded with.

Report ordered to be considered to-morrow; and Notice of Motion given—"That the further consideration of the Bill be postponed for three months."

Lord Brougham: I have now to state to your Lordships — having lately brought before you a case in connexion with the privileges of this House—that I have seen a statement, giving an explanation on the part of the newspaper in question, which certainly greatly confirms me in my opinion, that your Lordships ought not to proceed against the editor or printer of that newspaper; and my noble Friend, the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Wicklow), will forgive me for saying, that there was a misunderstanding with respect to my having ever intimated the propriety of that course. He and I agree on the question of privilege on the whole; and he would also agree with me on the propriety of rather leaving me, as the aggrieved party, to proceed at law by criminal information, if I might so choose. It is quite clear that I might do so, the paper having undoubtedly published a libel: and even if that which the paper stated to have passed in the House of Commons had passed there, that would be no justification whatever for the publication. Therefore, both my noble Friend and myself would have declined calling the parties to the bar of this House, for the purpose of punishing them for a breach of privilege. But I have to add, that it now appears a statement has been made by the same party, in the same paper, and in another paper also, against which it would have been my duty likewise to proceed, if I had proceeded against any paper, namely, the Morning Chronicle, for it has published the same speech, or pretended speech, verbatim, in the same words. I should, therefore, have proceeded against both papers, or against neither. But I have since seen a speech, or statement, in both these papers, purporting to be made by the same individual Member of the other House of Parliament who was represented to have made the unjustifiable speech—a speech which no person endeavours even to extenuate. That Member is made to say, in the same paper—and I have no doubt with his entire concurrence and consent, and I am therefore bound to believe it—that what he said, or rather, I should say, what he is represented to have said, was under an entire misapprehension of the facts; that he was not present in the Select Committee of your Lordships' House, as, of course, he could not be; and that he was misled by the reports which had reached him, and by not knowing that the questions put to the witnesses were the questions suggested by the petitioner. But the question of which he so much complained was a perfectly justifiable question, and it imputed no kind of impropriety to him, but merely referred to his having been canvassed for on some other occasion, for some other situation or appointment. It also appears in this statement, that, in alluding to the suppression of evidence, he did not refer to Mr. Parkes at all, but to some other persons; though that, too, must have been under a total mistake, as no evidence had been suppressed, every word given in evidence having been reported and printed, except what had been stated by Mr. Parkes, and which was not evidence at all. The same individual is stated to say—and I believe correctly to say—that he was exceedingly sorry he had given any pain to any individual, alluding to me; but I am sure the only pain the words gave me, was the pain of being obliged to talk before your Lordships of a subject connected with myself; for never could there be anything so absurd as the charges made. As it would appear that he had been under a total misapprehension of the matter, and exceedingly sorry that any pain should have been given to me, I am quite sure, such being the case, that I may anticipate the decision to which your Lordships are likely to come; and I would, therefore, wish to suggest, whether it would not be better not to discuss farther the question as to whether this be a breach of privilege or not, but rather to proceed no farther with it. My opinion is, that you ought never to proceed with questions of privilege of this nature; but that even such of your Lordships as differ from me as to the length to which I would carry this principle, will, I believe, under the circumstances of the case, and allowing for the great irritation of the party, concur in the course which I now recommend, of not proceeding farther in it, leaving it, of course, still open to me to prosecute the parties by a criminal information if I please—that is, the parties who published this libellous attack; because it is no protection to them to say that the words were spoken in Parliament, even if they had been spoken there, which I do not say was the case. The Member in question is stated to have said, that having seen a statement in a newspaper, of his having made a speech somewhere, he admitted the correctness of the report, because he had himself taken a note of what he had said—which note he must have taken after the speech was made; because it was added that he had stood up to speak wholly unprepared with what he was to say—and that he had afterwards compared this note with what had been published in the newspapers. He found his own note and the newspaper account fully to tally. No doubt he did. I am quite sure they tallied. Unless there happened to be an error in the press, they were sure to tally. And I will tell also of another tally. The Times and the Morning Chronicle have been compared in this matter; and they, too, have tallied precisely in words. There is, therefore, I think, no doubt of how the speech got into the newspapers. Now, one word more. I must say that I take for granted that this statement, as the newspapers represented it, was not at all the statement made elsewhere. I am bound to conceive that such "privilege" authorities as the House of Commons—holding, as they appear to do, the doctrine of privilege so highly—could never have allowed anything of that kind to have been uttered in their presence, if they had heard it. But still less can I imagine that that House could have allowed hours to have passed away next day, after having read, as of course they must, what had been printed in the newspapers, as having been said in their presence; and, therefore, I cannot, for the life of me, believe for one moment that the newspaper account—pretending to be an account of what passed in the other House last night—is true; that nobody had got up to complain of what was printed as having been spoken in their presence, and which was admitted to be the grossest libel—until rather latish in the day, when the party himself stood up, and made his statement. I take it for granted, the House of Commons, on seeing what had been published, would, for its own protection, and out of common courtesy to your Lordships, have at once taken notice of it. I cannot conceive the House of Commons to have acted otherwise; and I cannot believe that it acted in the way in which it was this morning represented to have acted, One word more, and I close my speech. One of the papers which published the libel, and which is now liable to prosecution for having done so—the Morning Chronicle—is pleased to say this morning, by way, I suppose, of making their conduct appear better, that though I rendered a great service to the public, with the help of your Lordships—for some little credit is really attributed to your Lordships—in throwing out the Dublin and Galway Railway Bill, which they suppose I have done, yet that I was greatly to be reprobated for the manner in which I did it; for that, being a judge in the case, I had prejudged it, before I acted upon the Committee that reported against it, and threw it out. It is a gross slander—a gross breach of privilege—to make such an assertion. I do not apply against the newspaper for saying so. I leave it in your Lordships' hands to decide whether you will choose to enforce your Lordships' privileges consistently in every case, to use it now and then, by way of relaxation. Now, I was not a Member of the Committee on this Bill; I could not, therefore, have prejudged the Bill. I had nothing whatever to do with it. I never gave an opinion one way or another upon it; and, for all these slanderers knew, I may have been in favour of it. It is not only not true that I got the Bill thrown out; but the Report was not even made, and the Bill is actually not yet thrown out. So much for the slander, that I had prejudged the Bill, and had got it thrown out of your Lordships' House; and so much for the value of contemporary history. I hope I may be allowed to say one word on these railway jobs. Every hour I live convinces me more and more, that Parliament will have a duty imposed upon it next Session to clear and protect itself, and to protect the public against these railway schemes. Members of Parliament ought to know—in this House they do know—but all Members of Parliament ought to know, that if a man is interested, directly or indirectly, in any railway, or in any other Private Bill, he is the last man in Parliament who ought to vote upon it, either in the Committee, or in the House. My Orders, as they are called—or the Orders that I succeeded in inducing your Lordships to adopt in 1837, respecting the Committee of Five—had introduced the greatest practical reform and improvement in this department; and it was one of these Orders which has had the greatest practical use, viz., that no Peer shall have anything to do with any Bill, either in Committee or in the House, with which he has any connexion whatever. I hope the same rule is adopted elsewhere; and I am sure it is only a rule which common justice would suggest, that men ought not to be judges and parties at the same time.

The Earl of Wicklow said, now that the question had been most happily set at rest, he felt obliged to make a remark with respect to the construction that had been put upon what had fallen from him on the last evening when the subject had been before the House. His object in suggesting that the editor and printer of the newspaper be called to the bar, was not for so unjust and unconstitutional a proceeding as to call the printer or reporter to the bar, and ask them about the accuracy of the report, with a view to punish them for a breach of privilege, when they had been made to criminate themselves; but his intention was to give his noble Friend an opportunity of changing the whole proceedings from a question of privilege into one for the decision of a court of criminal jurisprudence; and if the question had not been settled in a satisfactory manner that evening, he would have persisted in moving that these parties be called up for the purpose of getting such evidence from them as would have enabled his noble Friend to clear his own character elsewhere. He begged to add, with respect to the responsibility of editors and reporters, that he considered it would be the grossest injustice and the most unprovoked cruelty, if, after allowing these parties to take and publish accurate reports of speeches made in Parliament, they should afterwards hold them amenable for a breach of privilege for doing so. He begged to assure the noble Duke (the Duke of Wellington), that in requiring the parties connected with the newspaper to be brought up, it was with no intention of requiring them to criminate themselves.

Lord Monteagle said, he could not but think it was necessary to come to some new arrangement with regard to railway deposits. There was also a practice of examining witnesses before they were sworn, and swearing them on the following day in the lump to all they had been examined about the day before. He thought this system was very objectionable; but it was nevertheless a course of proceeding ~~which~~ prevailed to a great extent in the Committees of that House.

The Duke of Wellington thought it was a subject which deserved consideration, and it should be represented in the proper quarter.

The Earl of Devon was of opinion that the Committees should have the power of administering the oath.

Lord Campbell suggested that such an act might also empower the House of Commons to administer an oath, and might abolish the absurd rule which prevented so many Bills from originating in the Upper House.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY—THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.] Lord Brougham, pursuant to notice, rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She would be graciously pleased to give the necessary directions for having the New House of Parliament ready for the reception of this House at the beginning of the next Session. Nothing could exceed the suffering they endured in the morning sittings, sometimes from the heat, and at other times from the cold. Two or three thousand pounds expended in temporary fittings would enable their Lordships to occupy their new House by next Session.

Lord Wharncliffe said, that there would be great inconvenience in acceding to the Motion of his noble and learned Friend. It was impossible that the ventilation of the new House could be completed by the next Session; added to which workmen would be employed all around them, and the noise from the chipping of stones and other operations would be very great. He doubted, therefore, whether the new House, with the proposed temporary fittings, would be as convenient as the present.

Lord Campbell thought if they waited the convenience of Mr. Barry, he would put off till the Greek kalends the day of their assembling in the new chamber. He had suffered severely in his health from the unwholesomeness of the present house. He would beg to remind their Lordships of what they suffered during the three nights of the Maynooth debate. It was quite unnecessary that they should suffer so much inconvenience, as it appeared, from the evidence given before the Committee, that the House might be easily got ready by next Session.

The Duke of Wellington was sorry that the noble and learned Lords, for whose services they were so greatly indebted, suffered so much inconvenience in consequence of the new House not being completed; but he would beg their Lordships to recollect that the House of Lords was not the only consideration, but it was the chamber of Parliament, and there must be easy access for Her Majesty, and convenient communication between the existing House of Commons and the new building.

Lord Campbell said, Mr. Barry had told him that there would be no difficulty in getting the temporary fittings ready for the accommodation of Her Majesty by the next Session.

Lord Sudeley was aware of the inconvenience experienced in the morning sittings; but he did not think they would be better off if they were placed in the new building before it was sufficiently finished and warmed. It would be injurious, in his opinion, to press the matter for one year, if in the course of the following year they could get in with comfort for a permanency.

The Earl of Wicklow supported the Motion. He thought they would not get into the new House for the next five years unless it was adopted. The objection as to the noise of the workmen was of little moment, as they must leave work in the winter months before their Lordships would commence their sittings, and in the summer they ceased working at six o'clock.

Lord Brougham, in reply, said there was no probability that the law Lords who had occasion to sit in the early part of the day would attend to the masons when they were hearing counsel; the walls of the new House would, in fact, be so thick that they would not hear anything which took place outside. If there was any question about the accommodation for Her Majesty being complete, he had no doubt that illustrious lady would be pleased to open and prorogue Parliament by Commission for one year. He could not understand why the noble Lord (Lord Wharncliffe) objected to the Motion, unless there was something behind which they could not comprehend—unless it was contemplated in some high quarter to make the Houses of Parliament subservient, not only to legislative, but pictorial purposes. Now, ornament was an excellent thing, but business was of greater importance. He should certainly divide the House upon his Motion.

On Question, House divided:—Contents 16; Non-contents 40: Majority 24.

Resolved in the Negative.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS AND PAUPER LUNATICS BILL.] Lord Wharncliffe moved that this Bill be now read 2ª. His Lordship passed rapidly over the clauses of the Bill; and said, that as to the objection that the county would have to pay the expense, the House of Commons represented the ratepayers, and they had passed the Bill; and he was convinced that under this Bill the expenses would be reduced fully one-half. There was an opinion amongst some of their Lordships that the Bill should be referred to a Committee up-stairs; but, if that were done, what hope could there be of the Bill passing this Session? Several counties were waiting for the passing of the Bill, and the delay would be very injurious. He therefore earnestly recommended their Lordships to read the Bill a second time.

The Duke of Richmond admitted that a Bill of the sort was much required, but he objected to the present, because it was a very bad measure. He, therefore, wished to refer it for amendments, in the first instance, to a Select Committee. He did not know why this anxiety for legislation had come upon the Government so suddenly; why did they think that these pauper lunatic asylums were necessary, when they themselves sent all the old lunatic sailors from Greenwich Hospital to Warburton's, at Bethnal-green, where they were well taken care of. He also resisted that part of the Bill which threw the whole expense upon the county-rates, by which they would be greatly augmented. He should have been glad to have seen a portion charged upon the owners, and not entirely upon the occupiers of the soil. To refer it to a Select Committee would rather promote the passing of the measure, when it was fit to become law. After the second reading he should move that it be referred to a Select Committee.

On Question, Resolved in the Affirmative. Bill read 2ª.

The Lord Chancellor suggested that the farther proceeding on the Bill should be deferred, as a message was waiting from the Commons, in order to procure the expunging of a clause which had, accidentally and erroneously, been inserted.

After a remark from Lord Beaumont, on the disadvantage of hasty legislation,

The Message from the Commons was brought up, requesting their Lordships to expunge a clause in press 126, which had been erroneously inserted in the engrossment of the Bill, the same not forming part of the Bill as passed by the Commons.

Messengers informed that the Lords would send an answer by Messengers of their own.

A short discussion then took place as to the regular course of proceeding, and Lord Cottenham suggested that the Bill ought to be sent back to the Commons, that they might make their own Amendments.

The Lord Chancellor referred to a case which he said was precisely in point, and occurred in 1836, when the Commons requested the expunging of a proviso wrongly inserted in the engrossment of the Marriages Bill. The proviso was accordingly expunged without sending the Bill back to the Commons, and then the Bill, as amended, went through its various stages. The Marriage Bill was then in the same stage as the Bill now before the House.

The Earl of Devon said, that the case of 1836 was then a new precedent, different from the mode of proceeding in any former instance.

The Lord Chancellor added a reference to a case in 1803, which had been quoted and relied upon by Lord Melbourne in 1836, when what was now proposed by the Commons had been done. The other course would be attended with much inconvenience.

Lord Cottenham still recommended that the Bill be sent back to the Commons as the more regular course of proceeding.

Lord Wharncliffe moved—

"That the Proceedings already had in the said Lunatic Asylums and Pauper Lunatics Bill be vacated, inasmuch as it appears, by the Message of the Commons of this Day, that the Bill as sent up to this House was not the Bill which had been agreed to by the Commons."

The said Motion was agreed to; and ordered accordingly; and the aforesaid clauses were ordered to be expunged; and a Message was sent to the House of Commons, to acquaint them therewith.

Then the Bill was read 1ª.

COMMONS' ENCLOSURE BILL.] Lord Stanley, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, shortly stated its objects, and expressed the hope that late as it was in the Session, looking to the full investigation the subject had undergone elsewhere, and to the difficulty of passing a Bill of one hundred and fifty clauses through the other House, amidst the mass of other business, their Lordships would assent to the second reading, and not render it necessary to renew in another Session a measure which had been so fully discussed.

Earl Fitzhardinge expressed his regret that the Bill should have been introduced so late in the Session. He did not say that the Bill was without value; but there were defects and objections in its details which ought to receive the consideration of the House, and he wished particularly to direct their Lordships' attention to the 151st Clause, giving retrospective powers to the Commissioners to reopen any former award, and alter any allotment, the lapse of time being no bar to their proceedings. A great deal of injustice might result from such a power, and he hoped the subject would receive special attention in Committee. He thought, moreover, that the Bill ought to be referred to a Select Committee.

Lord Stanley explained that, although the Commissioners were to be clothed with the power the noble Earl had pointed out, yet, as provided by the 153rd Clause, it could not be exercised without the consent of three-fourths in number or value of the parties interested.

Earl Fitzhardinge inquired if the Bill could not be referred to a Select Committee?

Lord Stanley feared that at this late period of the Session he could not consent to the wish of the noble Earl, but he would be happy to confer with the noble Earl privately, when, perhaps, he might be able to remove his objections.

The Bill was then read a second time.

House adjourned.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

COAL TRADE (PORT OF LONDON).] On the Motion of the Earl of Lincoln, the Coal Trade (Port of London) Bill was read a third time.

On the Question that the Bill do pass,

Sir James Duke moved the introduction of the following clause:—

"Be it enacted, That, from and after the 31st day of December next, there shall be allowed upon the exportation from the Port of London, westward of the City boundary on the River Thames at Staines, of coals exceeding in quantity in one barge, lighter, or other vessel, twenty tons, which shall not have been landed, a Drawback of the full amount of all the Rates or Duties which shall have been paid in respect of such Coals, subject however to such rules and regulations as may from time to time be made by the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled, to prevent fraud in respect of such Drawback, such rules and regulations to be approved of by the Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council for managing the Affairs of Trade; and if the master of any vessel, or any coal weigher, shall, in any certificate or otherwise, state any circumstance which is not true, for the purpose of enabling the owner of such Coals or his agent, to obtain any such Drawback as aforesaid, or if any lighterman or other person employed to carry such Coals to their destination westward of the City boundary on the River Thames at Staines, shall not deliver the whole quantity of such Coals at some place to the westward of the said boundary, every such master or coal weigher, lighterman, or other person, so offending, shall for every such offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding one hundred pounds."

He thought that the great expense to which the inhabitants residing to the westward of the city boundaries were subjected for the conveyance of coals from the port of London, amounted to as much as the whole freight from Newcastle to London. He would be one of the last persons to hinder or lessen the revenues of the country; but in this instance he was sure that the introduction of this clause would increase commerce, and promote the prosperity of the city of London. Under these circumstances, he trusted the noble Lord would give the clause his favourable consideration.

Clause brought up and read a first time.

On the Motion that it be read a second time,

Mr. Hume seconded the Motion with pleasure. Coals that were unloaded in the Port and transmitted to the eastward of London, were allowed a drawback on the duty, and all they wanted was to put the inhabitants of the west end on the same footing as those at the east, and being such, he did not think the Government could offer any opposition to it. In his opinion, it was of the greatest importance to give all possible facility to the coal consumption, which trade was the great nursery of British seamen, and every restriction that was removed from the trade would tend greatly to encourage it. The Government had admitted the necessity for the removal of all possible restrictions from that trade, and he hoped that when the Government saw the great danger that trade was in of entire annihilation from the competition of railways, the Government would see the necessity of conceding this slight boon.

Sir G. Clerk could not consent to the introduction of the clause. Although he was perfectly aware that some decrease had taken place in the Greenland, South Sea, and coasting trades in the last few years, still the prosperity of the general trade had increased so much that he was sure there was not the slightest diminution in the amount of tonnage, or in the number of seamen employed during the past year. If they admitted the principle of allowing the drawback on coals carried to Staines, it would be necessary to allow it also on coals carried by canal, and they had no legal means of preventing those coals from being afterwards carried back into the city boundaries.

Mr. Forster supported the second reading of the clause. He thought that every encouragement should be given to the extension of our coal trade by sea, instead of hampering it by a continued increase of duties.

Mr. Stuart Wortley maintained that the allowance of the drawback would not present any difficulty that could not easily be surmounted.

The Earl of Lincoln resisted the clause, on the principle that the creditors of the coal-duty fund would suffer materially by permitting the drawback, and that it would be a breach of faith to them to do so without their concurrence. If the hon. Member were to carry this clause, the Government ought to permit the like drawback on coals carried by the Paddington Canal, the Grand Junction Canal, and the river Lee, and as that would be a serious interference with the revenues of the city of London, he should feel it his duty to object to the clause. He would advise the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the clause, and bring in a separate Bill next Session.

Mr. Wakley hoped the present discussion would be a lesson to the House how they again imposed taxes upon the necessaries of life on a promise that they should soon be got rid of again. Fuel was as great a necessary of life as food, and the increase in the price of that article, after leaving the hands of the wholesale dealer, and before it reached the cellars of the poorer classes, was not to be believed.

Mr. Muntz thought it extremely absurd that the duty should not be imposed on the continental consumer, and yet impose it on the consumer at home.

The House divided on the Question, that the clause be read a second time:—Ayes 24; Noes 37: Majority 13.

Bill passed.

STOCK IN TRADE.] On the Motion of Sir James Graham, that the Stock in Trade Bill be read a second time,

Sir R. Inglis presented two petitions against the Bill; one from the deanery of Exeter, and the other from the clergy of Sussex. The hon. Baronet then proceeded to state, that the title of the Bill conveyed to hon. Members a very imperfect idea of its objects. He asked the attention of the House for a short time to a statement of the subject now under consideration. For five or six years the Bill had been annually renewed, which was making the law permanent, yet avoiding any discussion upon the subject in that House. If it were thought desirable that the law should be altered, let a Bill be introduced—let it be fully discussed, and let the law be settled upon a fair basis, and so avoid the great evil of suspending the operation of the law by more renewal Bills. The present state of the law pressed very heavily upon a class of men who were entitled to the kindest consideration of the House. It took a considerable portion of the income from those, than whom no body of men were more charitable in their several parishes; he meant the parochial clergy. Year after year he had allowed the annual Bills to pass without observation, upon the understanding that the subject should receive the consideration of the House. He had expected that some attempt would be made in the present Session to settle the question of rating of all kinds of property—a question which he admitted to be full of difficulties—and he had waited until last week, when the present Bill was introduced; he then saw there was no hope that Her Majesty's Government would take the matter into their own hands; and, therefore, he had determined to call the attention of the House to it. He trusted the right hon. Baronet would not allow the Session to terminate without giving an assurance that the subject should receive the attention of Her Majesty's Government during the recess, and that early next Session they would be prepared to introduce a Bill to define and settle the law, and prevent the continuance of a great and pressing grievance. Having performed a duty he felt incumbent upon him, he would not oppose the second reading of the present renewal Bill; but he sincerely trusted it would be the last of its kind upon that subject.

Sir J. Graham agreed with the hon. Baronet that the subject was one of very considerable difficulty, and one of deep interest to that respectable class of men to whom he had more particularly alluded. The claim of the clergy to exemption from rating was founded upon two grounds, and there had been two different decisions upon the question in courts of law. The first case was that of "The King v. Jod-drell," wherein the decision of the Queen's Bench was in favour of the claim. That was in the year 1835; and about the same time, the Tithe Commutation Bill and the Rating of Property Bill were under consideration, and clauses were introduced into those Bills giving the clergy the benefit of that decision; but it was taken from them by a subsequent decision of another clause. The clergy, in his opinion, sustained no injury from the present state of the law, nor did they possess any claim other than that which belonged to them under the ancient law, when farmers were rateable only in proportion to their rents, and not in reference to their profits; and so far from the clergy being placed in a disadvantageous position in comparison with other ratepayers, they stood in exactly the same position as they did when the Tithe Commutation Act passed. He had said before that he thought the whole question of rating well worthy the attention of the Legislature. It appeared to him very doubtful whether the present parochial system of imposing the rate was the best that could be devised; and he thought it worthy of consideration whether some system not confined to such narrow limits, could not be adopted after mature deliberation. He thought, also, that it was desirable that there should be a better appeal against any inequality of rating. For any such inequality which might at present exist, there must be a general remedy; but he should deceive his hon. Friend if he held out to him any expectation of a special remedy in favour of the clergy.

Bill read a second time.

SLAVE TRADE (THE BRAZILS.)] On the Order of the Day that the House go into Committee upon the Slave Trade (Brazils) Bill being read,

Mr. Milner Gibson, feeling that this was a measure in the nature of a Penal Act against a friendly Power, and that it involved considerations of the greatest importance, bearing upon the peace and safety of Her Majesty's subjects in the Brazils and other parts of the world, had felt it his duty, before he should consent to the House going into Committee, to request the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Robert Peel) to supply the House with such information relating to the subject as he had in his power, in order to justify them in giving, as they were called upon to do, their assent to this Bill. The correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and that of the Brazils had been laid upon the Table of the House; but it appeared to him that there yet remained important matters which should be made known, before the House could be in a condition to judge whether it were right and proper to share in the responsibility of commencing, as it were, a series of hostilities, for that was, perhaps, not too strong an expression to use, against the Brazilian Empire. Hon. Gentlemen might have imagined that this was a measure in accordance with other Acts which had passed through Parliament, namely, acts enabling the Government to execute Conventions with Foreign Powers in reference to the Slave Trade. But on looking into the provisions of this present Bill, they would find that it called upon Parliament to give to the Executive Government a power to exercise acts of hostility towards the subjects of the Brazils, which acts must be viewed by that country in a light calculated to lead to resentment and retaliation on the part of the Brazilians, and perhaps superinduce a series of difficulties greatly impeding the trade at present carried on between this country and the Brazils. This measure would authorize our cruisers to seize and stop all vessels on the high seas suspected of being engaged in the Slave Trade, and which they supposed to belong to the Brazils. It would authorize the Ministers to empower such person or persons as they chose to stop any vessel on the high seas, if to such person or persons it appeared that the vessel in question was engaged in the Slave Trade. This would lead to the detention of vessels, the examination of their papers, and to other circumstances which might very soon involve us in difficulties with Foreign Powers. We had a Slave Trade Convention with the Brazilian Empire. A portion of that Convention had lately expired. In the portion which had thus expired, there were provisions giving to the respective Powers—England and the Brazils—a right of mutual search and visit of the ships of the two countries, and also provisions establishing Mixed Commission Courts, for the purpose of adjudicating upon vessels seized under the provisions of the Treaty. But all these stipulations had now expired, and the Brazilian Empire was no more bound by them than was the Government of England. But it was said that there existed, beyond these special provisions, a general obligation on the part of the Brazilian Government to abolish the Slave Trade; an obligation which was to be found in the First Clause of the Treaty of 1826, whereby the Brazilian Government bound itself to declare that the carrying on of the Slave Trade by any of the subjects of the Brazils should be treated as piracy. But the question here arose, whether, although the Brazilian Government bound itself by such an obligation, that could form a justification, on the part of the House of Commons, for giving to Her Majesty's Government the power of carrying out the obligation in that clause? It was urged that the time had now come for us to step forward and interfere—for us to exercise the power specified in the First Clause; and if the Brazilians would not abolish the Slave Trade, that we should abolish it for them. But this involved an important consideration as regarded the law of nations. He had the highest authority to quote, to the effect that the granting of such powers, on the part of Parliament, to the Executive Government, would not be consistent with the usual custom which obtained in cases of this kind between Foreign Powers. When a Bill similar to this was introduced into Parliament by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Lord Palmerston), the Duke of Wellington and the Lord Chancellor protested against it on this ground, amongst other grounds, that the object of the Bill was to authorize officers of the Crown to exercise acts which might be construed into acts of hostility against Portugal. There was a second protest to the same effect; and he was informed, on the highest authority, that the Bill in reference to Portugal was similar in all its enactments to the present measure. When this country made the Slave Trade piracy, there was an express proviso in the Act of Parliament to the effect, that British subjects and British ships, if captured in following the Slave Trade, should be tried by British tribunals; and the Act gave no power to a foreigner or to a Foreign tribunal to adjudicate on the life or liberty of any of Her Majesty's subjects. That was sufficient to show that it was understood, when the Treaty was entered into, that it was to be given effect to by the laws of the respective countries. He admitted that there was a feeling in the breast of every man in this country, that when a foreign country entered into a Treaty with us, if there afterwards appeared a determination on the part of such foreign country to avoid the carrying out of such Treaty, or a disposition to practise upon England, and to mislead us as to the course taken in the accomplishment of the objects of the Treaty, we had then a right to take some means to enforce the obligations created by the Treaty. But the Government were bound to consider, in the case of the Brazils, that the Executive Government of that country could no more do what they pleased, in reference to such a question as the Slave Trade, than the right hon. Gentleman, who was the chief adviser of the Executive in this country, had it in his power to act as he pleased in reference to such a question as the Corn Laws, or any other question which had a powerful and interested party banded together for its support. The Brazilians would feel that, in carrying out this Act, we were interfering with their independence, and would also feel themselves humiliated if they permitted us to do so. In addition to this consideration there were many powers, passions, and influences warring against the Government of the Brazils; and he would ask the House, before they consented to commit an act of hostility towards that Power, to consider well the difficulties which that Government had to encounter in any attempt which it might make for putting down the Slave Trade. He did not think that the policy which the Government of this coun-lry were now pursuing, was at all calculated to influence aright the only power that could put down the Slave Trade—public opinion, which might be rendered unfavourable to its continuance. Besides, had the Brazilians done nothing to put down this odious traffic, in accordance with the Treaty of 1826? Had they made no sacrifices, had they made no concessions? They had done as much in this respect as other countries similarly circumstanced. Could the right hon. Gentleman show the House, from the Papers now on the Table, that the Brazils had expressed a determination, from this time henceforth, to do nothing to put down the Slave Trade? He (Mr. M. Gibson) knew of no such determination on the part of the Brazils. When negotiations were pending in August, 1841, the British Government submitted a distinct proposal to put down the Slave Trade. Negotiations progressed; but on a sudden, in 1842, a note was received from the Brazilian Minister, conveying a peremptory refusal to proceed any further in the negotiation with respect to the Slave Trade. He would beg the House to recall to their recollection at what period this took place. It was when the Government of this country had first announced their intention to that of the Brazils of carrying on thenceforth against that country a hostile commercial policy, and of placing its produce in our ports under a species of ban and exclusion; and it was when Mr. Ellis was sent out to Rio Janeiro with instructions, which had never yet been produced to the House; and he was confident that these instructions, so studiously withheld, were an essential element for them to be in possession of, in order to be able to form a correct judgment upon the merits of the Bill now presented to the House. Mr. Ellis's negotiation had now come to a conclusion. No public interests could therefore now be affected by the production of the correspondence and instructions; and before the right hon. Gentleman called upon them to share in the responsibility of the contemplated acts of hostility against the Brazils, he was bound to show them that his own policy was not the policy which created the necessity for now resorting to such a measure—a measure which he regarded as nothing short of a declaration of war, and that such necessity, if it existed, would not be done away with by resorting to a different course of policy. They must have the whole case before them, or they were not in a condition to give to the Bill the support which was demanded of them. He found in the papers before the House, that Lord Aberdeen admitted that this was an extreme measure—that he adopted it with regret—and that if the Brazilian Government entered into terms with reference to the Slave Trade the Act would be repealed. The noble Lord clearly intimated, by this correspondence, that he was entering upon a harsh and hostile policy. Let the Government keep the responsibility of that policy to themselves, and not call upon the House to share it with them. If they thought that the circumstances of the case required such measures, let them make war openly upon their own responsibility, and come next year to Parliament for a Bill of Indemnity, which, if a sufficient case were shown, Parliament would no doubt grant. The Executive was shrinking from its real duty on this question. The Bill itself showed that the Executive Government of this country was doubtful of the rights which it possessed by the clause in the Treaty of 1826. If the clause gave them such rights as they stated, he said the Government had shrunk from carrying those rights into execution. This Bill gave no power to deal with Brazilian subjects, but merely to seize and confiscate Brazilian ships. It appeared, then, that our rights under this Treaty were questionable, and that the Government scarcely dared to exercise them. It seemed to him, also, that if the clause of the Treaty did not give the right to interfere with subjects, it would not give the right to interfere with ships. Again, he would put it to the Government, was it proper to press on a Bill of such importance, and involving such important consequences, with so much haste? An important amendment had already been introduced by the Government into the Bill since it was first brought forward. They had provided that the parties who seized these Brazilian ships should be entitled to the bounties and tonnage dues usually allowed in such cases. Now, let it be recollected, that Parliament had voted, out of the Consolidated Fund, 20,000*l.* or 30,000*l.* to the officers and crews of our cruisers for seizing Brazilian slave ships. He would call upon the Government to consider the probable result of the course they were now adopting on the minds of foreign nations. Already suspicions as to our motives were entertained; and it was said, in reference to the practice of sending the negroes found in the captured slave vessels to our own Colonies, that England required labourers for her own Colonies, and was taking the shortest course to procure them by sending those negroes which her vessels of war found in the captured Brazilian ships into her own Colonies. Then the mortality amongst the negroes during their passage to our Colonies was as great almost as in the middle passage, and that improper crowding of vessels, which was so properly complained of as a feature of the Slave Trade, we ourselves were actually guilty of. A letter written by Mr. MacLeod, dated Trinidad, February, 1844, mentioned that 288 negroes were brought in there in a vessel from Rio Janeiro, several having died on the passage. It was too generally the impression in the Brazils that it was our own advantage we sought in our efforts to suppress the Slave Trade, and it was thought, too, by many that the reason why the officers in command of our cruisers were so active off the coast of the Brazils was the bounties and pecuniary advantages which resulted to themselves from the seizure of slave vessels. He considered that the course we were adopting was calculated to excite the feelings and passions of the Brazilians against us. What would have been our own feelings were some foreign nation to attempt to interfere with us in the same way as it was proposed now to interfere with the Brazils? When England was a slave-trading country itself, it would have repelled with indignation such an interference on the part of any foreign country. He (Mr. M. Gibson) was almost inclined to agree with the view expressed the other night by his hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead (Mr. Hutt); he was almost inclined to go with his hon. Friend in saying that it was doubtful whether the exertions of our cruisers on the coast of Africa and on the coast of Brazil, for suppressing the Slave Trade, had not tended to increase the evil it was our object to put an end to. At all events he was inclined to think our policy in this respect was questionable; and should his hon. Friend in the course of the ensuing Session feel it his duty to move for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the subject, he would support him. What at this moment was the position of the great interests of this country—of our manufactures—in reference to the Brazils? The Brazilian Government said, we will put a discriminating duty on your manufactures of 20 or 30 per cent. as compared with the duty we impose upon the manufactures of other countries; and we will continue that discriminating duty until you give up your exclusive policy in reference to our sugar, and until you receive that sugar on the same terms as you admit the sugars of the most favoured nations. He called upon the right hon. Baronet to show to the House that it was not his own policy that had brought Lord Aberdeen into that disagreeable necessity in which he had admitted he was placed in proposing to carry out the clause of the Treaty of 1826 in this hostile spirit—and he would call upon the Government to say, supposing that the result of this measure should be the confiscation of the property and the endangering the lives of British subjects in the Brazils—whether they had contemplated such a contingency—whether they had considered all these things? Some time ago Lord Aberdeen intimated, in reply to a question put to him, that a Treaty was about to be concluded with the Brazilian Government, and he had no doubt that British property and British subjects in the Brazils would be respected. But the late mail contained nothing confirmatory of that statement, and every reason to suppose that no such Treaty as that to which the noble Lord alluded had been concluded with the Brazils. He called upon the Government to say how long were the great manufacturing interests of this country to be jeopardized—how long were the property and the lives of British subjects to be endangered, in order to carry out the peculiar views of a small section of the anti-slavery party in this country? He said a small section, for he was justified in saying that the anti-slavery party, as a body, disapproved of the policy of Ministers—and the Memorial which had been presented to the Government from that body, distinctly deprecated armed interference. The hon. Member concluded by saying that he should take the sense of the House against the Bill.

Sir R. Peel said: I will, as shortly as I can, state to the House the objects of the Bill which has been sent down by the House of Lords, and which I now move shall be considered in a Committee of this House. The international engagements between Brazil and this country in respect of the Slave Trade rest on a Convention concluded between the two countries in 1826. By the First Article of that Convention, it was provided that it should not, from a time therein named, be lawful for a subject of the empire of Brazil to be concerned in carrying on the African Slave Trade under any pretext or in any manner whatever, and that the carrying on of such trade after that period by any person or subject of His Imperial Majesty should be deemed and treated as piracy. There was, therefore, an international engagement between this country and Brazil, that from a certain time the subjects of the Brazilian empire, engaged on any pretext or in any manner in carrying on the Slave Trade, should be guilty of the offence of piracy. The Brazilian subject was not merely by the municipal laws of his own country liable to the penalty for piracy; but there was a solemn engagement entered into between the Brazilian Government and this country by which the offence was made piracy. Shortly after that Convention there was another entered into by the Brazils, adopted from one that was existing between Portugal and this country, concluded in 1817, which had for its object the determining, by mutual arrangement between the two countries, in what mode effect should be given to that engagement. A mutual Right of Search was given in the case of Brazilian ships and English ships, and Courts of Mixed Commission were appointed for determining offences at variance with the existing engagements. Either Government had the power in its own discretion to terminate that Convention in the month of March, 1842, a period of fifteen years from the time it was entered into. Brazil thought fit to give notice of her intention to terminate that subsidiary Convention, and this Government thought fit to accede to such desire on the part of the Brazilian Government. But there remained in force the original Article of the Treaty of 1826, and the object of this measure is to give effect to the stipulations of that Treaty. A great part of the hon. Gentleman's speech appeared to be in favour of the abandonment of all policy on our part for the suppression of the Slave Trade. The hon. Gentleman says, imputations are thrown out on the faith and integrity of this nation, and that on that account we ought to be particularly careful how we interfere with the rights of other countries. No doubt such imputations are thrown out, and thrown out from interested motives. There is no doubt a desire to depreciate the character and paralyse the exertions of this country in the suppression of the Slave Trade; but I think the sacrifices this country has made for the mitigation of the evils of the Slave Trade, and for the termination of the status of the Slave Trade, may enable her safely to defy all such unjust suspicions. The hon. Gentleman says, there was a time when this country herself carried on the Slave Trade, and the bishops in the House of Lords made speeches in its favour. The fact may be so; but does the hon. Gentleman think that that constitutes an argument why we should relax in the efforts we have made for the suppression of the Slave Trade? The Government proposes this measure with regret. It would have been infinitely more satisfactory to them that the Brazils should have consented to enter into a new engagement in substitution of the engagement of 1817, and should have acted in ready concert with us in the suppression of the Slave Trade. I have laid on the Table the correspondence that has passed on this subject, and I leave it to the House to judge whether any effort on the part of Her Majesty's Government for the last ten years has been omitted in order to induce the Brazilian Government of its own good will to enter into that friendly concert. The House will see what have been the proposals that have been made from time to time; not recently, but during the period my noble Friend Lord Aberdeen has been Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and during the period the noble Lord opposite held the same office. The House will find that repeated exhortations were addressed to the Brazilian Government, for the purpose of inducing them to enter into amicable concert with us, and to enable us to search Brazilian vessels, and to punish those who were engaged in the Slave Trade under that Act which had been agreed to by the Brazilian Government of its own free will. But those efforts have failed. The Brazilian Government have from time to time distinctly stated to us, that her views on this subject are entirely at variance from ours, and from the Brazilian Government we can expect no assistance or co-operation in the suppression of the Slave Trade by her own subjects. Shall we then altogether abandon our efforts? Shall we hold the Convention of 1826 to be of no effect; and, notwithstanding that international engagement between the Brazils and this country, shall we permit Brazilian subjects and ships to carry on the African Slave Trade without any independent effort on our own part to suppress it? First, I say, that the Brazils themselves have admitted that this country, under the Convention of 1826, has a right of its own authority, failing other engagements entered into with the Brazils, to suppress the Slave Trade carried on by Brazilian subjects. The hon. Gentleman will observe in the correspondence that has taken place, in a note presented by the Brazilian Government, that at an early period subsequent to the last Convention, Brazil expressly considered that under the Convention of 1826, this country had a right to interfere for the suppression of the Slave Trade. He will find in page 7 of the Printed Papers, that in a document issued by the Brazilian Government, it was stated that the Government had received from the British Minister an assurance that certain Brazilian vessels which had been employed in trafficking in slaves, but which could prove that on or before the 30th day of March, 1830, they were not so employed, should be allowed to proceed and finish their bonâ fide voyage without incurring the liability of being treated as pirates, according to the Convention of 1826. The hon. Gentleman, again, will find that the Brazilian Secretary of State relied on the Article in the Convention of 1826, as a proof that the Slave Trade was totally forbidden to Brazilian subjects. No law was passed in the Brazils at that time, making the Slave Trade piracy; for the Brazilian Secretary of State said, that the Slave Trade was abolished, and that the offence was constituted piracy; and, in saying that, he was not speaking of the municipal laws passed by the Brazils, but of the effect of that Convention which had been signed between this country and the Brazils. But efforts were made to put an end to the Mixed Commission. Objections were made to it by the Brazilian Government; but in making those objections, the Minister of the Brazils urged that the continuance of the Mixed Commission was unnecessary; because, under the Convention with England, there was a power on the part of the two Governments to suppress the Slave Trade, by making it an offence cognizable by their own respective legal tribunals. There was, then, a distinct admission that we had a right to treat the offence as piracy, virtually by the law of Brazil. The hon. Gentleman says, he will not share in the responsibility of the Government in bringing forward this measure. What is the effect of it? We consider that the Crown is empowered to direct the detention of Brazilian vessels. We have not acted without the fullest deliberation. It was the impression of the noble Lord opposite, than whom none has paid more attention to this subject, that on the suspension of the last Convention an Act of Parliament would be absolutely necessary to give effect to the Convention of 1826; and the noble Lord inquired of me whether it were my intention to propose a Bill for that purpose. It is true that we did not proceed without mature deliberation. We approached the subject with great caution and reluctance, for we were most anxious that the Brazils should take the course which Spain took in 1835, and Portugal in 1842, and by mutual stipulations should have enabled us to effect this object. But all we do by this Act is not to give the Crown the power to issue these orders, for we think that the Crown has the power to direct the detention of Brazilian vessels, in virtue of the Convention, and we are prepared to take on ourselves the responsibility of issuing those orders. But at present the Vice-Admiralty Courts of this country are prohibited from taking cognizance of these offences. At present, without the intervention of an Act of Parliament, I apprehend that the Vice-Admiralty Courts could not proceed to the adjudication and condemnation of Brazilian vessels; and it is necessary to provide in this case, as you did in the case of Portugal, that the Vice-Admiralty Courts should have that jurisdiction of adjudication and condemnation, with respect to vessels seized on suspicion of carrying on the Slave Trade, which they would not have without it. The hon. Gentleman tells us to issue the orders on our own responsibility, and trust hereafter to an Act of Indemnity. It is infinitely better to ask from Parliament the power of adjudication upon vessels that are seized, rather than to issue orders and leave it in doubt whether there be any jurisdiction competent to decide upon those points. The hon. Gentleman refers to a speech made, and a protest entered into, by my noble Friend in 1839, with reference to the Bill proposed by the noble Lord, enabling the British Government to detain Portuguese vessels concerned in the Slave Trade. I, for one, seeing there was an indisposition on the part of Portugal to fulfil the obligations of her Treaty with this country with respect to the Slave Trade, felt that the noble Lord was justified in the measure he proposed. I saw the unavailing attempts he had made to prevail on Portugal to fulfil those stipulations into which she had entered with this country, and that after benefits received from this country, and every diplomatic effort having failed, I thought that the noble Lord was fully justified in calling on Parliament for their assistance. Both Houses have, from time to time, presented addresses to the Crown for the suppression of the Slave Trade, and have assured the Crown of their willing co-operation in case legislative interference was necessary. Those addresses were unanimously carried, and therefore on the part of the Crown, I think, after the Convention of 1817, I should be abandoning my duty if after those addresses I permitted that state of things to arise which would arise unless you give to the Vice-Admiralty Courts the jurisdiction which this Bill proposes. But the noble Lord proposed in the case of Portugal an Act of Parliament expressly giving to the Crown the power of issuing orders, and enabling the Vice-Admiralty Courts to exercise those powers. At a subsequent period, after some difficulties in respect to the first Bill, the House of Lords acquiesced in what was proposed by the noble Lord; but the case of the Brazils is very different from the case of Portugal. In the case of Portugal there was no such Treaty as in the case of the Brazils. There was an engagement on the part of Portugal that she would co-operate with you generally in the suppression of the Slave Trade—that she would pass a law prohibiting the Slave Trade—that she would give you a Right of Search; and she engaged to do various things which she did not do, and entered into various stipulations which she did not perform, and the noble Lord asked for the interference of Parliament to compel Portugal to do that which the British Crown had required of her, but which she refused to do. But that was a casus belli. The noble Lord thought the conduct of Portugal justified the Crown, first in making the most urgent diplomatic remonstrances, and, those failing, then to call on Parliament to compel Portugal to enter into her engagements. If the hon. Gentleman refers to the protest of my noble Friend, he will see that it proceeded upon those grounds: because the Constitution of this country and the usual practice had been to leave it to the Sovereign, acting on the advice of Her Ministers, to come to a decision upon all questions of peace and war; and to carry into execution such measures and to order such operations as Her Ministers proposed. My noble Friend contended that in the case of Portugal it was a casus belli—that the Crown ought to have proceeded upon its own imperial authority, and declared war against Portugal to compel her to perform her engagements. But this is not a casus belli, it is a casus fœderis. There are stipulations by the Brazils with this country expressly declaring that carrying on the Slave Trade by Brazilian subjects should be piracy; we therefore do not ask Parliament to enable us to declare war against the Brazils. We are content under the Convention, after taking the advice of the highest authorities in this country, including my lamented Friend Sir W. Follett, whose name I shall never mention without a feeling of respect for his memory as that of a most distinguished man. After the best consideration, and after communication with the Queen's Advocate, he and the other highest authorities in this country, gave us deliberately their opinion, that, under that Convention, failing the agreement and consent of the Brazils to other measures for the suppression of the Slave Trade, we were entirely authorized in continuing to exercise the Right of Search over Brazilian vessels. The right now reverts to the Crown of acting under the Convention of 1826; and, supported by the advice to which I have referred, we feel it to be our duty to abide by it, in so far as to give to the Admiralty Courts the power of exercising the rights conferred by that Convention. I think the hon. Gentleman cannot complain that I have thrown any difficulty in the way of the production of all the Papers which, consistently with my sense of public duty, I could lay before the House. He will see that, in the last communication we made to the Brazilian Government, there is an expression of deep regret that considerations of public duty compel us to propose this measure, and an assurance that we shall have the utmost satisfaction in proposing to Parliament its repeal, if—influenced by the Act of the noble Lord in 1839—the Brazils shall enter into a Treaty with us, not for the suppression of slavery, not for interference with any institutions in the Brazils, but for the purpose of giving effect to the original engagement of 1826. We have waited to the last; for a series of years we have implored the Brazils to substitute something efficacious in lieu of this temporary measure; at length we feel driven to the necessity of interfering ourselves, to enforce the exercise of our right. But, at the same time, while we intend to exercise that right for ourselves, we accompany the intimation of our intention with an earnest exhortation to the Brazils to relieve us from this necessity, by entering into amicable engagements with us on the subject. The hon. Member for Manchester says that this measure is imperfect, because some alterations were proposed by me in Committee, into which the House went pro formâ the other night. But what was the alteration that was then made? It was simply this:—As the Mixed Commission, with the consent of the two parties, are to continue their operations for six months, in order to preclude any doubt as to the validity of their decisions, a clause was inserted giving to the decisions of that Commission all the force which their decrees had under the former Convention. As the period for which that Commission is to sit, is continued beyond the term specified in the original Convention, the object of that clause was merely to solve a doubt which might have arisen as to the validity of their subsequent decrees. I also introduced into this Bill the usual clauses—similar to those contained in the Portuguese Act, and in every other measure of the same nature—enabling the Lords of the Treasury to award to vessels which succeed in capturing slave-ships a proportion of prize-money. These clauses, being regarded as money clauses, were omitted in the other House of Parliament; and it became my duty to propose their insertion in the Committee in this House. I think, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman's charge, that this Bill has been got up with such haste as to render considerable alteration necessary, is, so far as it regards the alterations to which I have referred, altogether unfounded. I am not aware that there is any other point to which it is necessary for me to refer. The correspondence I have already laid on the Table will probably afford sufficient explanation of the circumstances under which the Bill was prepared. I again repeat, that it is with reluctance I propose this Bill; and I trust that the necessity of continuing it will be removed by the voluntary act of the Brazils, in entering into a Treaty with us similar to the Treaties we have concluded with Spain and Portugal. I can assure the hon. Gentleman I shall have much greater pleasure in recommending the repeal of this Bill, than I now have in proposing it to the House. The negotiation with the Brazils—not for a tariff, but for a commercial treaty, is still making progress; and if I felt that any good object could be promoted, or the success of the pending negotiation advanced, by the further production of Papers and instructions, I would readily consent to lay them before the House. The instructions I have already produced will, I think, afford proof that I have been desirous to lay upon the Table such information, bearing, in my opinion, immediately upon the subject, as I could do consistently with my public duty; but I regret that I cannot consent to produce the instructions issued to Mr. Ellis alluded to by the hon. Gentleman opposite.

Mr. Hutt believed that if this Bill were passed its effect would be, in the course of two years, to destroy all commercial intercourse between this country and the Brazils. Although this measure might, to some extent, prevent the Brazilian flag from affording protection to the Slave Trade, he believed hon. Gentlemen were mistaken if they supposed it would have the effect of preventing that trade from being carried on to the same extent as at present. His conviction was, that this measure would not diminish the Slave Trade; and in a fruitless attempt to effect that object the Government were sacrificing some of the best interests of this country, and bringing us to the very verge of war, or, at least, placing us in circumstances which it would be the highest wisdom to avoid. He therefore felt it his duty to oppose this Bill.

Viscount Palmerston: As I cannot concur in the views of many hon. Gentlemen near me, I am quite prepared to give Government my support as to the Bill now under the consideration of the House; indeed, I have no other course to pursue, having, as the right hon. Baronet has reminded me, been the first to suggest that this course should be pursued. Let us see how we stand. There exists a Treaty, concluded in 1826. Now, the question for the House to consider is, whether that Treaty is to be allowed to remain a dead letter; and whether all that was to be accomplished under it, and by it, is to be permitted to remain unfulfilled? or whether this House is to take such measures as it can, in order to carry it into practical execution? Parliament has repeatedly addressed the Executive since the year 1814, urging the Crown to conclude Treaties with Foreign Powers—pointing out the object of these Treaties to be the suppression of the Slave Trade—and, in some cases, suggesting the means by which they were to accomplish the purposes in view. Now, it would be utterly disgraceful to the country if Treaties so concluded were allowed to be violated by the bad faith of the Governments with whom they were contracted. I am sorry, Sir, to say, that it is impossible to state in exaggerated terms the just accusation against the Brazils, of bad faith as to the Conventions agreed to by it, respecting the Slave Trade. It is true, that the Government of which I was a Member did, during the ten years we were in office, urge, year after year, by every possible argument, the Government of the Brazils to fulfil the engagements by which they were bound. But all our inducements—all our arguments—all our persuasions, were utterly fruitless; and whenever the subject of the Slave Trade has been discussed here, the notoriously bad faith of the Brazilian Government has been on all hands admitted and deplored. Therefore, the question is, are they to be permitted to carry on their Slave Trade with perfect impunity? or are you to take, in order to prevent them, the only means which the Treaties you have passed, place within your power? Considering the matter in this light, I am prepared to share in any responsibility which, as an individual Member of Parliament, may accrue to me, in giving my support to this measure. At the same time, I must admit that there is some force in the observations of my hon. Friend (Mr. M. Gibson), that if the Government had not taken that injudicious course which they have thought it right to pursue, with respect to the Government of the Brazils, as to the Sugar Duties, I think it is very possible that we should not be placed in the situation in which we now find ourselves; because, Sir, it is certainly true, that that course was calculated to produce a great deal of unnecessary irritation in the Brazils—irritation which may have led the Government of that country to put an end to the Treaty of 1817. The argument of my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, however, that you cannot expect Brazil to submit to what we now propose to do, because England would not submit, were any Foreign Power to assume the right of exercising on our coasts that sort of inspection and police, which we propose to establish on those of Brazil —I say, Sir, this argument does not appear to have much weight; and for this reason—the Government of the Brazils is bound by Treaty to submit; and I hope and trust, that were we so bound, we should also submit. Indeed, I am convinced we should; for I have such an opinion of the honour of this country, that I know we should submit to any inconvenience, however galling to the national pride, were we bound by stipulation to do so. Therefore, in asking Brazil to fulfil her engagements, we are only urging what we ourselves would consent to do, under converse circumstances. I fear, however, at the same time, that what the hon. Member for Gateshead anticipates, in regard to the effect of the Treaty, may, in a great degree, take place. I am very much afraid we shall find the result of this will be, not to put an end to the Slave Trade of the Brazils, but to drive it to take shelter under some other flag. It is quite clear, that if the Right of Search be given up with France, and if it do not exist with America, that the Slave Trade to Brazil will be carried on under the flags of France and of the United States. Nevertheless, it is, perhaps, a point gained to drive it out from under the flag of Brazil, if such should be the effect of the Treaty. It seems to me, however, that a remark of the hon. Member for Manchester was not understood by the right hon. Baronet, as it was not adverted to by him, while he answered an observation which my hon. Friend did not make. I understood my hon. Friend to have put a particular question; and if he did not, I beg to put it myself. The Treaty with the Brazils says, that the subjects of Brazil who may, directly or indirectly, be concerned in carrying on the Slave Trade, shall be deemed as pirates; while the Bill before us merely applies to ships, not to subjects: and, if I understood my hon. Friend, he alluded to this discrepancy, and expressed a wish to know what were the grounds on which Government, proposing as it does to carry out the stipulations of the Treaty, introduced a measure different from that which these stipulations would allow them to propose. It appears to me, that the Bill falls short of what the Treaty would justify. Government, in acting under the Treaty, might deal with the subjects of Brazil, whilst the Bill is limited to dealing with ships and cargoes; and it may be remarked, that the confiscation of vessels and goods must be incidental to the crime of piracy committed by the owners of the one, and the navigators of the other; and, therefore, surely you are as much justified in punishing the latter, as in extending the consequence of their crime to matters contingent on the offence. Sir, I with to take this opportunity of recalling to the attention of Government one or two points which I more than once endeavoured to impress upon their notice, and which I hope will receive their attention during the recess. I would advert for a moment to the Slave Trade carried on upon the coast of Muscat. I adverted some few days ago to a Treaty signed by an officer of the French Government, which seems to me calculated to lead to a renewal of the Slave Trade from Zanzibar to the Isle of Bourbon. Since then, I see that the Duc de Broglie;

in the French Chamber, has stated that the Treaty did appear to contain some stipulations liable to that accusation; and on that ground, some of these clauses were not ratified. But if anybody will look to the Treaty which has been published to-day in the Anti-Slavery Reporter, it will be evident that it is hardly possible to ratify any portion of the Treaty without leading to the encouragement of the Slave Trade, and particularly of the land Slave Trade, on the eastern coast of Africa. For if you engage or hire persons who are in a state of slavery such as exists in Zanzibar — if you hire and carry them to another country, their places must be supplied, and will be supplied, by means of the internal Slave Trade of the country; and, therefore, I do hope that the Government will make those friendly representations to the Government of France which they are undoubtedly entitled to make, in order to urge the latter Cabinet to consider whether this Treaty, if acted upon, will not have the effect of encouraging those abominations of the Slave Trade which France—in common with every other civilized nation—must wish to see abolished. I think, however, that our Government ought to come to the consideration of the matter with clean hands; and I should recommend them to reconsider the orders issued by the Governor of the Mauritius, giving sanction to similar proceedings for the supply of labourers in that Colony. There is certainly this distinction between the two cases—slavery does not exist in the Mauritius, and, therefore, you can take care that the negroes brought thither shall be secured in the condition of free men; while slavery does exist in Bourbon, and labourers imported there, necessarily sink into the condition of slaves. But if the supply of labourers to Bourbon, give encouragement to the trade in Africa—a trade attended with so much cruelty—might not Government urge upon the Imaum of Muscat some arrangement to mitigate those horrors, of which the other night I read a description, taken from that part of Sir Fowell Buxton's work on the transport of negroes from San Sebastian to Zanzibar? I am sure that if Government were to express a strong feeling to the Imaum, much good might be done. Sir, I do trust that Government will not agree to permit the Governors of Cuba and Surinam to send to Coventry our Consuls and Slave Trade Commissioners in those countries. I may ask, too, whether the Governors of Cuba and of Surinam have been compelled by our Government to receive the communications which our Consuls and Commissioners are ordered by those who have sent them out, to make?

Sir R. Peel: We have made representations to Spain upon the subject, insisting upon the right of our Consuls and Commissioners to be heard.

Viscount Palmerston: I am only putting the right hon. Baronet in mind of the matter, as, amid the multiplicity of affairs to be attended to by a Government, it might be left to pass unnoticed. I know that the Governor of Surinam did not go so far as the Governor of Cuba. He took no notice of the representations of our agents, and in the whole year 1844 no answer has been received from him to any of their applications. I am sure, then, that the right hon. Baronet will feel that our officers are, both in Cuba and Surinam, in a position quite inconsistent with due respect for the Government which they represent. There is another point I wish to mention, relative to those negroes conveyed into Surinam. Those negroes have been so carried away against the law of England. The consequence was that they became forfeited to the Crown, and the result of that forfeiture was their freedom. Such being the case, then, I say that no Foreign Power can have a right to retain British subjects in a state of slavery, unless they have some legal right on which to ground that act of theirs. But in this case, the subjects of Spain and of Holland, who purchased those slaves, purchased them illegally; and I do hold that these British subjects are entitled to be rescued from the state of bondage in which they are now held, by the interference of the British Government. I hope the subject may receive the fullest and most liberal consideration of the Law Officers of the Crown, and if they feel that the Dutch and Spanish Governments have not an unquestionable right to retain these negroes in bondage, that Her Majesty's Government will feel that, not under any particular law, but under the general international rights of countries, they will be enabled to demand that these British subjects shall be set at liberty. Then there are the Emancipados. No progress has been made in giving them that freedom which by Treaty, and the decree of the Mixed Commission, they are entitled to. When General Valdez was in Cuba, from 1,200 to 1,400 were set free. There remained slaves, some 2,000 or 3,000. It was then stated, that to liberate them all would be productive of inconvenience to the Colony. The excuse was quite futile; but so long as the Cuba authorities went on increasing the number of those to whom were granted certificates of freedom, there appeared little reason why the Government of this country should press the matter. This progress has, now, however, been stayed. General O'Donnell has ceased to grant these certificates of freedom; and seeing that such is the case, I hope that the Government will insist upon the virtual freedom of these nominally emancipated slaves. There is another point on which I am anxious to touch—namely, the case of those negroes introduced into Cuba in violation of Spanish law. It was on that question that the late Government proposed to that of Spain a Convention, giving a Mixed Commission Court power to inquire into the matter. The Spanish Government objected, and our Government acquiesced in the objection. I think that their doing so was unfortunate. We have, by Treaty, the right to demand that these negroes should be admitted to the freedom to which they are entitled. At all events, we are bound to press the point, that all negroes henceforward imported into Cuba should be free; and I am sure that if the point were pressed on Spain, it would go further than anything else to bring it to a faithful execution of the Treaty as it stands. I repeat, that in my opinion, some such arrangement might be made. Sir, I hope that the Slave-Trade Papers of next year may justify more than the Papers of this year, the expectations held out by the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government that we should find satisfactory proof of the activity and energy of the Ministry upon the subject. When they talk of the Slave Trade, they say everything which a man can desire; but when we look to what they have done, I am sorry to say that their acts fall very far short of their promises. And as people have sometimes the habit of judging men by what they do rather then by what they say, I am afraid, as the matter now stands, that it is impossible to give them much credit for any active zeal in furthering an object so dear to every good and every reasonable man. I hope, however, that the points which I have urged, will not escape their attention; and I may be also permitted to express a hope that next year we shall have the Return which last year I moved for; so that we may have some better grounds to go upon, as we shall have when we know how many negroes are imported from time to time into America. May I hope that the industry of the Foreign Office shall be put in motion, and that a Return moved for in July, 1844, may be presented in February, 1846?

Sir Robert Peel was understood to say, that if the noble Lord could point out the way in which the Returns could be made up, he would request Mr. Mandeville (as we understood) to use every exertion to supply the information. He could assure the noble Lord that he hoped it would be forthcoming, and he thought that Mr. Mandeville, whose diligence and ability the noble Lord was well acquainted with, would be able to satisfy him that it was not from inadvertency or negligence that the delay in the production of the Returns had arisen.

Mr. Gibson wished to explain. What he meant to have said, and which seemed to be understood, was, that the Executive in Brazil having declared traffic in slaves piracy, but there being no law there to that effect, it was questionable whether we could carry into effect in English courts such a law against Brazilian subjects.

House resolved itself into Committee on the Bill.

On the 1st Clause,

Captain Pechell said, he hoped the Government would not be unmindful of the officers who had done such important services in the Slave Trade. Lieutenant Wilson, of the Wasp, had been on a raft for twenty-one days, and he endured such sufferings, that he (Captain Pechell) considered him worthy of the highest reward. Six only out of thirteen escaped.

Sir R. Peel said, there really must be a limit to the recommendations of promotions in that House. He had undertaken that in the case of the very gallant conduct of Mr. Robertson, a promotion should take place. But he should recommend that, as a rule, the question of promotion should be left to the decision of the Crown.

Sir G. Cockburn said, there was a clear distinction between the two cases cited. The promotion of one was for an act of extreme valour, which, if it had been imitated, the disasters which had taken place might not have occurred. The other was the case of an officer who, by an accident of the elements, was placed in great peril. No doubt he deserved credit, and his case in all its bearings would be considered by the Admiralty; but it was quite distinct from the former.

Mr. Hawes was anxious to know whether the Government had any objection to produce the instructions given to Mr. Ellis. The right hon. Gentleman was justified in proposing this Bill; but it was in consequence of the failure of the negotiations it became necessary. It was important to know, then, what the instructions were which led to the first rupture. Those who were better informed than he was, anticipated a still greater alienation of the Brazilian Government, in consequence of the present proposal. Parliament had, therefore, a right to know the origin of the evil.

Sir R. Peel said, the House had always that degree of confidence in the Minister, as not to press for the production of documents which he pledged himself could not be given without detriment to the public service. He did not think these instructions had any immediate bearing on the present policy of this country, and he assured the hon. Gentleman their production would not increase the prospect of a successful termination of the negotiations for a commercial Treaty. If the hon. Member looked to the Papers before the House, he would see, that long before the mission of Mr. Ellis, every effort was exhausted to bring about an amicable negotiation on the subject of the Right of Search. So far back as 1835, an application with this view was refused. In 1840, a new proposition was made, but with a similar result. In 1841, also, when the Slave Trade was extensively carried on, Brazil refused to take any steps in conjunction with this country for putting a stop to it.

Mr. Gibson said, that in 1841, when the negotiations were pending, they were brought to a sudden termination by the passing of the Resolution of the noble Member for Liverpool, which displaced the late Government. The House had a right to know what were the instructions which led to the alienation of Brazil. The right hon. Gentleman asked the House to put confidence in him. He did place confidence in the right hon. Gentleman, but not so far as to consent to legislate in the dark.

Viscount Palmerston: The memory of my hon. Friend must be shorter than I could have supposed, for the substance of the instructions to Mr. Ellis were stated at the time. I think, what was stated was, that it was intended to propose to the Brazils, some law which, by internal operation, should modify the condition of slavery. There was proposed by Mr. Ellis as a sine qua non, some law applicable to the condition of slavery, and the Brazils began by a condition sine qua non, inadmissible by any negociator for this country; and, therefore, Mr. Ellis never found himself in a situation which would enable him to state officially the condition which we wished to impose. Most unquestionably I always considered such a condition a very injudicious step on the part of our Government. We were perfectly entitled to press measures which would cause them to fulfil their engagements to put an end to the Slave Trade; but we had no Treaty rights to stand on which would justify us in calling for internal regulations as to the condition of slavery. It must be obvious to every one that we were taking the bull by the horns—that we were asking what it was not in the least likely we could, by any possibility, obtain—and that when we made the passing of a law as to slavery, the condition of our admission of their sugar, we were opposing an obstacle which it was impossible to overcome.

Clause agreed to.

On Clause 3, which provides that vessels engaged in the Slave Trade, contrary to Convention, should be tried by Courts of Admiralty,

Sir Thomas Wilde said, it must be borne in mind that this clause subjected those who belonged to another State to trial by our law. Now, in the first place it must be observed that the mere agreement between the Brazils and this country to pass a Treaty declaring the Slave Trade piracy, could not be brought into operation against the subjects of the Brazils, unless a law was passed there for the purpose of giving it effect, no more than the mere declaration of the Minister could apply to our subjects, unless the Legislature carried it into operation by a special Act. When that Treaty was made, a particular jurisdiction, called the Mixed Commission, was created, to try the question as to the forfeiture of vessels acting in contravention of it; and the British Legislature passed an Act restricting the jurisdiction of the Courts of Admiralty, with respect to such cases as were likely to come before the Mixed Commission. Whether the Courts of Admiralty would or would not have had jurisdiction he should not stop to inquire; but it seemed to be assumed that they would have had such jurisdiction, by the restraint imposed by the Act. The present Act, however, gave them express jurisdiction. The First Clause declares that the subjects of the Emperor of the Brazils, if found engaged in the Slave Trade, should be deemed guilty of piracy; and then by this clause it was declared that the Courts of Admiralty should have jurisdiction over any vessels engaged in the Slave Trade in contravention of the Convention of 1826. Now, he could very well understand that as a general principle both countries should agree that the subjects of each engaged in the Slave Trade should be guilty of piracy; but the question was, could they go so far as this Bill attempted, and declare that foreign subjects—

"Shall be tried by the like rules and regulations as are contained in any Act of Parliament now in force in relation to the suppression of the Slave Trade by British owned ships?"

Would it not be better to say that they should be proceeded against as pirates? With respect to the negroes alluded to by his noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston), perhaps he might be allowed to suggest a difficulty as to their position, which struck him forcibly. At the time these negroes were transported there was a property in them recognised by the law of England. Now, supposing they were goods, and that you prohibited their exportation, would you, because their transfer was a forfeiture in your own subjects, be justified in saying to a foreigner who had fairly purchased them, "We demand these goods because a British subject illegally exported them?" The Crown could acquire no title to them except by record; but the judgment once obtained, it referred back to the Act of Forfeiture. If the goods could be seized before the new title of the foreigner intervened, we might claim them; but, as it was, the question required great consideration.

The Attorney General was sure the House must feel greatly indebted to his hon. and learned Friend for the valuable suggestions which he had thrown out. As he was particularly anxious that his hon. and learned Friend's opinions should not be misrepresented, he begged to ask him whether he correctly understood the proposition which his hon. Friend had laid down? If he understood him correctly, his hon. and learned Friend denied the power of the Brazilian Government to enter into a Treaty with this country, by which the dealing in slaves should be declared piracy. [Sir T. Wilde: No, no!] His hon. and learned Friend then admitted that the Brazilians had the right to enter into such a Treaty. In 1826, the Brazilians adopted all the stipulations of the Treaty with Portugal of 1817, which embodied all the stipulations respecting the Mixed Commission, and in which it was declared that dealing in slaves on the part of the subjects of either State, within three years of the ratification of the Treaty, should be piracy. In consequence of the adoption of the Treaty, the Mixed Commission Court was a necessary part of the stipulations, and the 7th and 8th of George IV. was passed. In March, 1845, the stipulations of the Treaties with the Brazils, with respect to the Mixed Commission and other matters, ended. It was admitted that the Brazilians passed no law for the abolition of the Slave Trade; but he contended that the whole of the Treaty, declaring it to be piracy, was equivalent to the abolition of the Slave Trade by that country. The question was, whether, in consequence of this Article in the Convention, the jurisdiction of the Admiralty and Admiralty Courts still existed. He had no doubt on the subject; but it appeared that doubts were entertained The question, then, was as to the mode this matter should be dealt with. He knew no other mode in which they could treat the subject than to regard it as piracy, and then, inasmuch as parties guilty of piracy were liable, by the law of nations, as enemies of mankind, to the most severe punishment, they should be dealt with accordingly. As the Mixed Commission would expire, it became necessary to revive the jurisdiction of the Courts of Admiralty, and powers must be given to them accordingly; therefore, he considered that the first part of the clause was essential and necessary. The first part of the clause enacted—

ions, to take cognizance of and adjudicate any vessel carrying on the African Slave Trade in contravention of the said Convention of the 23rd day of November, 1826, and detained and seized on that account subsequently to the said 13th day of March, by any person or persons in the service of Her Majesty, under any order or authority of the Lord High Admiral, or of the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral, or of one of Her Majesty's Secretaries of State, and the slaves and cargo found therein."

He thought, with submission to his hon. and learned Friend, that it would be better to give this power under the Article of the Convention, instead of saying that engaging in the Slave Trade must be treated as piracy. It would be better to refer to the Article of the Convention, than to a course which might imply an erroneous interpretation of it. The clause then went on—

"In like manner, and under the like rules and regulations as are contained in any Act of Parliament now in force, in relation to the suppression of the Slave Trade by British owned ships, as fully, to all intents and purposes, as if such Acts were re-enacted in this Act, as to such vessels, and to such High Court of Admiralty, or Courts of Vice-Admiralty."

He admitted, that he thought that this part of the clause deserved very serious consideration, as to how far they might carry out the provision by this stipulation. He did not mean to say that he could not justify it; on the contrary, he believed that he could; and he certainly could not abandon the latter part of the clause without serious consideration. He had heard the objections of his hon. and learned Friend for the first time; and he admitted that they involved matters worthy of consideration. Did he understand his hon. and learned Friend meant to say, that there was great danger in adopting the clause as it stood? He thought that it would be better to leave the objection of his hon. and learned Friend for further consideration at a future stage of the Bill; but he was not at once prepared to adopt his views.

Sir T. Wilde wished shortly to explain. Suppose that this country made a Treaty with the Executive Government of a foreign nation, and in which there was an Article declaring that to be piracy which was not so by the law of nations—for some civilized nations had regarded the Slave Trade as legitimate commerce — suppose that Executive Government had no powers from its Legislature to punish such act as piracy, could that Government enforce the stipulation in the Treaty? If the Executive Government possessed the power of making criminal laws, there the case ended. The Minister who made the Treaty must be assured that he could get the Legislature to make a law to carry out this stipulation, or in other respects it was a dead letter. If a country could not maintain the provisions of such a Treaty against its own subjects, how could it do so against the subjects of another Power? Was it meant to say that this country had greater power and authority over Brazilian subjects, than over British subjects? There might be countries where the executive and legislative powers were united in the same body; but this was not the case with respect either to the Brazils or this country. He apprehended that two Executive Governments had no power to make that a crime which was not acknowledged to be so, by the respective Legislatures of those two countries. Therefore, any agreement between two nations did not constitute an offence piracy, without the legislative authority of each. Were there any other stipulations in the Treaties than the Convention alluded to, to give this power of confiscating slave ships, and prosecuting the parties as having been guilty of piracy? He understood, that because the Brazilian Government had put an end to the Mixed Commission, that this Bill had been introduced; but he would say, take care that its provisions were confined within the bounds of the existing Treaties. He would suggest, if there were other powers or stipulations on this subject, that they should be looked to most attentively, as the subject was of great importance. Recollect that this clause applied an interpretation and a law to piracy, which was not applicable by the law of nations. They might punish their own subjects as pirates for any offence they pleased; but could they pass a law to punish as pirates the subject of another nation, for committing such an act against the subjects of a third nation? They had no more right to make a law binding on the subjects of Brazil, than they had on the subjects of China, or any other nation; and they had no right to punish them for an alleged act of piracy, which was not piracy by the law of that country. If powers did exist in the Treaties, they must take care that they strictly adhered to them, or the worst consequences might ensue; but the probability was, that they could not do anything. All that he wished to suggest was, that before they attempted to act as they proposed, that they should exercise the utmost caution.

Sir R. Peel was satisfied, that the hon. and learned Gentleman had no other object in view than the promotion of the public interest, in the suggestions which he had just made. The hon. and learned Gentleman's objections were mainly directed to the latter part of the clause. He was bound to say that the preparation of this Bill was committed to the most able hands; and if he mentioned the names of those gentlemen it would be sufficient to make the Committee assured that it had received the most mature consideration. There were two subjects to be considered in this matter—the situation in which the Brazilian persons engaged in the Slave Trade would be placed by the clause, and the situation of Brazilian slave vessels captured. The Bill did not authorize more to be done against Brazilian persons or Brazilian property so engaged, than could be done under the present Convention. Under the Article of the Treaty of 1826, it was, perhaps, doubtful whether authority was not given to each Power to judge as to whether any case of slave trading was piracy or not. Since the Treaty was signed in 1826, which was subsidiary to that with Portugal in 1817, this country had only dealt with property, and not with persons engaged in the Slave Trade. The object of this measure was also only to deal with property. He admitted that it would be difficult to deal with Brazilian subjects engaged in the Slave Trade as pirates; for by their own municipal law it was not piracy; and even if it were, the punishment in the two countries for that crime was not similar. British subjects for that offence were liable to transportation for life; but this was not the case with Brazilian subjects. With respect to the engagement with the Brazils, in the First Article of the Convention there were two provisions, the one having respect to the period of the abolition of the Slave Trade, and the other to its absolute abolition. The Article was—

"At the expiration of three years, to be reckoned from the exchange of the ratifications of the present Treaty, it shall not be lawful for the subjects of the Emperor of the Brazils to be concerned in the carrying on of the African Slave Trade, under any pretext, or in any manner whatever, and the carrying on of such trade after that period, by any person, subject of His Imperial Majesty, shall be deemed and treated as piracy."

It was thought to be compatible with this Article of the Treaty to proceed against the parties so engaged in the Slave Trade before the Admiralty or Vice-Admiralty Courts, for penalties not exceeding those imposed for piracy. With regard to Brazilian vessels so engaged, the law was the same as with respect to British vessels. It was thought by the high authorities who framed this Bill, that there was nothing inconsistent with the Treaty in enforcing the penalty as that proposed. He would, however, refer the subject to those persons, and would take it into his consideration before the third reading. Before that period, he could assure the hon. and learned Gentleman, that the Bill should undergo further consideration; and for this purpose there should be no delay in communicating with the gentlemen who framed it. If the case should be as stated by the hon. and learned Gentlemen, he would see what alterations could be made.

Mr. M. Gibson observed that the right hon. Baronet had stated that it was not intended to provide against the persons of Brazilian subjects who were taken while engaged in the Slave Trade; but Lord Aberdeen, in his despatch just laid on the Table, stated that under the Treaty he could deal with Brazilian subjects engaged in the Slave Trade as pirates. This was very different from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman.

Sir Robert Peel stated, that the Convention enabled them to deal with both persons and property engaged in the Slave Trade; but for the last thirty years, they had not carried the Convention into effect against persons. Practically the treatment under the Treaty was not the same between the two countries, as there were no British vessels engaged in the Slave Trade; but many Brazilian vessels had been and were now engaged in it; but in no case had a Brazilian subject been proceeded with for piracy for being taken in a slave ship, although many Brazilian vessels had been confiscated for having been so employed. All that they asked for, was sufficient powers to suppress the Slave Trade, in conformity with the stipulations of the Treaty. Although an abstract right existed as to dealing with persons engaged in the Slave Trade, there would be the same abstinence as for the last thirty years from exercising the extreme right; and although they might, under the Treaty, deal with Brazilian subjects engaged in the Slave Trade as pirates, yet they, under that Bill, only really asked for powers to confiscate the ships of Brazilian subjects employed in the Slave Trade.

Captain Pechell said, that under this Bill they proposed to deal with captured Brazilian slave ships in a different manner before the Admiralty Courts than before the Court of Mixed Commission. He doubted whether they could do this under the Treaty. In this Bill they took the power of destroying ships so taken, whereas under the old Treaty they were sold entire, which made a great difference to the captors. He believed that they had not legal authority to break up these ships. This country never had a power under the Convention to detain a Brazilian ship equipped for the Slave Trade. He wished to know whether it was now intended to detain Brazilian vessels equipped for the Slave Trade in the same way as they did ships under the Spanish Treaty?

Sir R. Peel replied, that the equipment was admitted as a proof of a ship being engaged in the Slave Trade.

Clause agreed to.

On the 4th Clause being put,

Mr. Muntz suggested that they should report progress after the statement of the learned and hon. Member for Worcester, in which he so ably showed the difficulties which would attend this measure.

Sir Robert Peel would assure the hon. Member that he would take no unfair advantage, if they went on with the Bill then. If it was necessary, he would introduce the proposed alterations in the third reading.

Mr. M. Gibson did not believe that they would carry out the objects of the Bill by means of it; he therefore trusted that his hon. Friend would persist in his opposition to its progress then. The whole power of the Bill was involved in the 3rd Clause, and this was open to the most serious objections. Because they were then in July or August, he did not see why they should not do their business properly. If they could not do so, let the right hon. Gentleman prorogue Parliament, but do not force measures through the House in July, without that consideration which they would have received in March.

Sir R. Peel was willing to recommit the Bill if necessary, provided it was allowed to go through its present state. The Bill could not have been brought in at an earlier period of the Session, in consequence of the requisite information not having been obtained from the Brazils, and it was of importance that it should pass without delay. He argued that the subject required the most serious consideration, and it certainly should receive it; but he trusted that the hon. Member would not then press his opposition.

Mr. Muntz said, that under the circumstances, he would not press his objection at the present stage of the Bill, although he still objected to its being hurried through the House. He felt after what had been stated by the hon. and learned Member for Worcester, that the attempt to act in such a manner would lead us into such a contest with one nation that it would produce a general war.

Clause agreed to, as were the remaining clauses. House resumed.

TURNPIKE ROADS (SCOTLAND).] On the Motion that the House go into Committee on the Turnpike Roads (Scotland) Bill,

Mr. Scott moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee this day three months.

Mr. P. M. Stewart defended the Bill. It had been fully discussed in the other House, and it had received the sanction and support of the principal Scotch authorities.

Mr. Forbes Mackenzie was of opinion that toll-houses ought to have the privilege of supplying refreshments, as had hitherto been the custom, otherwise great injury would be inflicted on the toll trusts.

The House divided on the Question, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:—Ayes 16; Noes 42: Majority 26.

Main Question, as amended, agreed to. Bill put off for three months.

FEES (CRIMINAL COURTS) BILL.] On the Order of the day being read that the House go into Committee on this Bill,

Mr. B. Escott said, that all that was sought by this Bill was to prevent an accused party from being put to the necessity of buying the right of pleading, and the right of trial, by the payment of exorbitant fees. He believed that the law, as it at present stood, was sufficient to protect parties accused, if they were only aware of their right. But it was the practice in many quarters to refuse the plea of not guilty to an individual charged with a misdemeanor, unless he paid the fee demanded, and to send him back again and bring him up at a subsequent Sessions, until at last the fee was extorted, or the individual was allowed to take his trial because he was utterly unable to pay. In thirty-two counties of England and Wales this practice had already been abolished, and it appeared that it was only in twenty counties that it was still permitted to exist. He wanted that to be declared by the House to be the law, and that, throughout the whole country, the same practice should be carried into operation, as was already carried out in the majority of the counties. They never could get justice done in this matter until they decided that no payment was to be demanded from any person charged with a crime, but the penalty which the court which tried him had a right to impose as a punishment for the offence, or as damages to the party aggrieved. Why, he would ask, should this Bill be opposed? It was simply a measure of common justice to a person charged with crime. Money was at the root of much of the opposition which this Bill met with in the country. Under the present system, the fees formed a convenient mode, except to the party that paid them, of paying certain officers of certain courts. He trusted that after the large majority by which the Bill passed its second reading, it would be allowed to proceed in Committee, when, if any suggestions were made which would facilitate its practical working, he would be happy to give them every consideration. The course of criminal justice should be free from so foul a stain as that which now disgraced it; and until it were free from such stain, neither would the laws nor their administrators be, as they should be, respected.

Sir J. Graham said, that his hon. and learned Friend referred to the majority by which the second reading of the Bill was carried. He had voted with that majority; but so voted in order that the Bill might go into Committee, without pledging himself to its support in its present shape. His hon. and learned Friend went into Committee, resolved to maintain the Bill in its present form, including exemption from fees on conviction as well as on acquittal. He was opposed to all useless legislation, and his hon. and learned Friend had stated that the exaction of the fees was at present illegal. He doubted the soundness of this law, especially as regarded persons charged with misdemeanors out on bail; these were obliged to pay fees, and, so far, he was willing to amend the law. To that limited extent he was prepared to go, but not as far as the Bill went. In his view, every person convicted ought to be compelled to pay at least part of the expenses.

Lord J. Manners was in favour of going into the Committee, in order to make the Bill as unobjectionable and useful as possible.

Mr. Palmer expressed his concurrence with the hon. Member for Winchester, as regarded fees on acquittal, but several charges ought not to be looked upon as fees.

Dr. Bowring agreed with the hon. Member for Winchester, inasmuch as no fees ought to be charged either upon conviction or acquittal.

Mr. Darby was disposed to get rid of the Bill altogether, rather than include in it all the provisions it now contained. All the costs allowed by 7 and 8 George IV. were injudiciously abolished by this measure. He moved that the House should resolve itself into a Committee on this day three months.

Sir J. Graham gave notice that he would to morrow (this day) move for leave to bring in a Bill to abolish fees on pleading and acquittal in criminal cases, if this measure were rejected.

Mr. B. Escott agreed to the proposition of the Home Secretary.

Amendment withdrawn.

Order for Committee discharged. Bill withdrawn.

HEALTH OF TOWNS.] The Earl of Lincoln said, he had had a Notice on the Books of the House for some weeks past, to move for leave to introduce a measure with reference to the health of towns, founded on the Report of the Commission appointed two years ago, which Report was laid on the Table in February last. He had been most anxious to give a general outline of the measure; but at this late hour of the night, and at this advanced period of the Session, he thought it would be better to ask leave to introduce the Bill without any comment. Had time allowed, he would have taken the opportunity, on introducing the Bill, of giving an ample statement of its details. Such a statement would, however, occupy considerable time; and if he were to postpone the Bill to a future day he could not expect, at this period of the Session, to gain the attention of the House to the dry details of a measure of this description. He would, therefore, merely move that the Bill be read a first time and printed, in order that it might be considered during the recess, and brought forward at an early period of the next Session. He hoped the public would examine the provisions of the Bill, and that its details would be fully canvassed. He trusted also that hon. Members of that House who represented large constituencies would devote some attention to the measure, and make such suggestions to the Government as they might deem advisable. The noble Lord then moved for leave to bring in a Bill "for the improvement of the sewerage and drainage of towns and populous districts, and for making provision for an ample supply of water, and for otherwise promoting the health and convenience of the inhabitants."

Leave given.

Bill brought in and read a first time.

Ordered to be printed.

House adjourned at a quarter before two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, July 25, 1845.

MINUTES.] Sat first.—The Lord Foxford, after the Death of his Grandfather.

3ª. and passed:—Londonderry and Coleraine Railway; Yolker Road (No. 2); Wakefield, Pontefract, and Goole Railway; Severne's Estate.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. From Inhabitants of Finsbury, for the Appointment of a Committee to Inquire into the past and present Condition and Treatment of Lunatics in England and Wales, whether Pauper or otherwise.—From South and North Leith, against the Poor Law Amendment (Scotland) Bill.—From Inhabitants of Port Phillip (New South Wales), for the Adoption of Measures to obtain for the District of Port Phillip, an entire Separation from the Government of the Colony.—By Lord Cottenham, from W. H. Miller, Esq., of Britwell House, Bucks, praying to be heard by Counsel against parts of the Poor Law Amendment (Scotland) Bill.—From Presbytery of Dunoon, for Improving the Condition of Schoolmasters (Scotland).—From Stockholders, and others, of District of Maitland, for Alteration of Law relating to Territorial Revenue, and Disposal of Lands, etc. (New South Wales).

PRIVILEGE.] Lord Brougham presented a petition from James Thomas Russell, of No. 37, Percy-street, Bedford-square, solicitor, complaining that two witnesses who had been examined before the Committee of their Lordships' House on Gaming, had given false and slanderous evidence against him, to the great detriment of his character, and of the characters of all those connected with him; and praying that, as he found it would be a breach of the privileges of their Lordships' House to bring an action at law against those parties, some opportunity might be afforded him of vindicating his character. As the Session was now so near its close, he would move that the petition do lie on the Table, with the intention of moving early in the ensuing Session that it be referred to a Select Committee.

The Lord Chancellor said, he should be very ready to assist his noble and learned Friend in investigating this subject; but he wished to remind their Lordships that the Committee alluded to in the petition had sat last Session, and the petitioner had allowed the matter to lie over without taking any notice of it for a whole year, and until after this House had decided that it would not allow him to go to law. He thought their Lordships could draw a natural and almost necessary conclusion from that circumstance.

Lord Brougham said, the petition stated that it was only on Saturday last that the petitioner first saw a copy of the evidence of which he complained.

The Lord Chancellor: But he does not state that he did not previously know of the evidence having been given.

Lord Brougham said, the law allowed a party four years to bring his action, and he would humbly submit that their Lordships were not justified in not merely shutting out an aggrieved party from redress in a court of law, but also in refusing him any other relief.

Lord Campbell said, he was inclined to think that Russell was the name of a person who had been subjected to a very rigorous cross-examination at the bar of their Lordships' House by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham) on the very subject alluded to in the petition. He would, however, strongly support the Motion of his noble and learned Friend for inquiry.

After a few words from Lords Brougham and Stradbroke,

The Earl of Wicklow said, he thought, no matter what the character of an individual might be, the House had a right to give him an opportunity of clearing his character. In reply to what had fallen from his noble Friend on the Woolsack he wished to remark, that any delay to which the petitioner might have been a party should be calculated, not from the time that the Committee had made their Report, but from the period when, their Lordships having consented to give a copy of the Report to the Commons, the latter House had thought proper to sell and promulgate the libel which it contained.

The Lord Chancellor said, he had no desire to oppose the Motion for inquiry, but he had merely wished to draw their Lordships' attention to a point of date.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

IRISH GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY BILL.] The Earl of Hardwicke presented a petition from John Frederick Stanford, of Langham-place, esquire, stating that he was a holder of shares in the Dublin and Galway Railway, which he had been induced to purchase in consequence of the Report of the Board of Trade being in its favour, and praying to be heard at the bar of their Lordships' House on his own behalf, and on behalf of other shareholders.

Lord Brougham said, the petitioner was a member of his own profession, and a most respectable gentleman, and he (Lord Brougham) was exceedingly sorry that he had not invested his money in some other funds. But perhaps the Board of Trade would think it their duty to grant him some relief.

The Earl of Dalhousie said, the Report of the Board of Trade in favour of the line was a perfectly good Report. With respect to the funds under the control of the Board, he regretted to say they were very limited indeed, but he should be happy to have the advice of the noble and learned Lord as to their disposal.

The Earl of Besborough said, in moving on a former occasion the second reading of this Bill, he did so for the purpose of giving an opportunity of having it referred to a Select Committee, who would report on all the remaining allegations against it. Before making the Motion, of which he had given notice on the preceding day, it was necessary that he should call their Lordships' attention to the further Report which had been presented from the Committee by the noble Lord opposite (Earl Bathurst). After reading some passages from the Report, describing the course of systematic fraud that in the opinion of the Committee had been practised in getting up the subscription contract deed, the noble Earl proceeded to say that he knew it would be maintained that the same system had been adopted in respect to many other railways, indeed in most other railways. He did not, however, think, that that should induce their Lordships to pass over a case of this kind, which had been substantiated by two Committees of their Lordships' House, even if all the railway projects which had passed through Parliament had been got up in the same manner. It was true that the promoters of this railway now state their readiness to put in so many solvent names in their deed as would make up the number required by Parliament. But even that circumstance could not, he thought, alter the decision to which their Lordships should come, as, if the Standing Order respecting the contract deed was of any value, it ought to be adhered to regularly and in all cases. He was quite aware that there were many upright persons who were ready to take shares in this Company, under the idea that they would be promoting a Bill which was calculated to forward a great public work in Ireland, and open a line of railway through a part of the country where it would prove most beneficial; and it was also an important consideration that it would be the means of giving employment to a vast number of persons, who, at this season of the year, would be otherwise unable to procure work. He was aware that much evil would arise from a rejection of the Bill, on these grounds; but still he believed that a much greater evil would result—considering the circumstances of Ireland, now just commencing great public works of this kind, if the Parliament were to depart in their favour from the rules which it had laid down, and which were necessary to be followed in the proper construction of all railways. Under these circumstances, he felt obliged to move that the further consideration of the Bill of the Irish Great Western Railway Company for the construction of a railway from Dublin to Galway be put off to this day three months.

The Marquess of Clanricarde said, he had to oppose the Motion of his noble Friend; and if he had no other ground for doing so, he felt that a paragraph in the last Report of the Committee would justify him in requiring an adjournment of this debate. He was informed that the sentence to which he alluded was written by a noble Lord, under a total misapprehension of the facts; and that there was no evidence whatever to support it, because no such could have been given, as nothing of the kind had, he was given to understand, ever taken place. The sentence of the Report to which he alluded was in these words:—"That systematic fraud has been used for the purpose of obtaining the necessary number of signatures to the subscription contract." He could state, without hesitation, that that was a total misapprehension of the facts. There was no doubt but that gross frauds had been exercised for the purpose of obtaining scrip and allotments of shares in the Company; but as the sentence in the Report read, it would appear that these frauds had been perpetrated by the promoters and directors of the Company, instead of by totally distinct individuals. If it turned out that he had been misinformed, he would at once give up the Bill and the Company; but he thought so serious an allegation was one that should not be allowed to pass without inquiry. He would say nothing more at present, except to move that the debate be adjourned, with a view to have the evidence taken before the Committee printed. He might be permitted to add, that with this Company he had no personal connexion whatever. He did not hold one shilling's worth of shares, he was sorry to say, in that or any other railway company; he had no railway shares whatever, though he wished he had; but, as a person having property in the west of Ireland, he felt extremely interested in the Dublin and Galway Railway. The noble Marquess concluded by moving that the debate be adjourned, in order that an opportunity might be afforded of having the evidence taken before the Committee printed.

Lord Brougham said, that instead of there being no evidence yet before the House, there were upwards of a hundred pages of evidence already printed and before the House upon this very subject. Having been a member of the Committee, he would state exactly how the matter stood. There was no doubt but that there were two different kinds of fraud in these cases. In one, the fraud might be committed against the Company, namely, by persons forging names, and writing fictitious and fabricated letters, in order to get allotments of scrip; and, in the other, the fraud would be on the House; namely, by persons connected with the Company—he did not mean respectable Gentlemen, like some of those at the head of this Company; but agents or persons employed under them, getting up contract lists for the purpose of complying nominally and fictitiously and fraudulently with the Standing Orders of Parliament. But he would show their Lordships in what way these two classes of fraud became one fraud on the House. He now spoke from the evidence. It was needless to say, that the persons promoting these companies were not those whose names appeared at the head of them, very likely for patriotic and public purposes; but they were a set of harpies who wished to gamble in the share market, and a set of persons whom he would not otherwise designate but as professional men—such as engineers and land surveyors, who were great promoters of railway schemes for their own private purposes, in order to obtain employment; and these parties all interested themselves to promote the Bill in the manner which he would state to the House. They might get up fabricated lists by directly fabricating names, by forging signatures, by putting down names of persons who had no existence, or who resided in the West Indies, or who were parish paupers. That was one mode, and a most clumsy one, of committing fraud; but there was also another mode by which fraud could be practised against the House. It was to issue a prospectus with a flourishing and puffing account of the scheme that was about to be brought forward, and to declare at the same time that whoever applied for shares would have allotments; and if the promoters after this took no steps to ascertain that the applications which they received were real applications—if they wilfully shut their eyes against attempts at fraud, and received the applications, in nine cases out of ten, or perhaps in ninety-nine cases out of 100, without inquiry—was it not precisely the same thing as if they were themselves guilty of the fabrications, and were in a conspiracy to deceive the House? Now, what was the evidence in the present case? The Committee took it all from the agents of the Company—from the parties themselves; and yet the facts stated to them were, that 970 persons had applied for shares, and that of these only 111 gave any references at all to show whether they were really existent or solvent persons or not. But was that the way with the London and York Railway Company? No; for, on the contrary, the moment they got any letters without references they threw them into the fire. Not so, however, with the Dublin and Galway Company. They received all applications, though only 111 of them were accompanied with any references, and of these they instituted inquiries into only twenty-nine, out of which fourteen were found to be totally unknown. They thought it better, therefore, not to inquire further, and actually gave shares to the other eighty applicants, without making a single inquiry into the references which had been given. What was the consequence? They alloted thirty shares to Mr. Henry Penton, of Crosby Hall Chambers, who never had an existence in the world; ten to Mr. William Baldron, a silkthrowster in London some years ago, but who went to the West Indies seven or eight years ago; and shares to the amount of 3,500*l.* to Margaret Meredith, a parish pauper! The letters were examined in four hours—allowing ten seconds for each letter. They knew that if they wanted to carry their Bill they must have a list of a sufficient number; for which reason they closed their eyes. Now, if a person had the means of inquiring, and did not choose to inquire, he was just to be treated as if he did. He had every reason to believe that this was a great and beneficial public work, that it was wished for by the people of Ireland, and that it was calculated to confer great benefit on that country; but even so, the House was bound to protect itself where deliberate fraud was attempted to be perpetrated against it. He would, therefore, heartily support the Motion of his noble Friend.

Lord Monteagle said, he had been a Member of the Committee, and if their Lordships would do him the honour of remembering anything that had fallen from one so unimportant as he was, they would not forget that, when the petition in this case had been presented by the noble Duke, he had declared that he thought it would be better that all the railroads in the country should be lost, than that the House should refuse to inquire into a petition like that, involving an accumulated charge of forgery, fraud, and innumerable other offences. That petition had been referred to a Select Committee, and the evidence taken before that Committee had been reported and laid on their Lordships' Table. On that evidence he, for one, would have been perfectly prepared to support a Motion for postponing the further consideration of the Bill for six months. He thought the evidence so clear and conclusive, that he would have no hesitation in coming to that vote on that occasion. But he wished to call their Lordships' attention to the course which the House had taken subsequent to that time. If the question had rested on the evidence, he would, as he had before stated, have been prepared to negative it; but their Lordships did not come to that conclusion. They thought proper to refer the petition, with the Report and the evidence, to the Select Committee appointed to consider the Bill itself—thus showing that they required some further evidence. The Motion of the noble Marquess was, that the House should be put in possession of that additional evidence, and he could not help thinking that it was consistent with the course taken by the House itself in requiring additional evidence to be taken. He could not apprehend that the evidence when produced would affect the final vote to which they should come. Still the fact of the House requiring further evidence would seem to imply that the evidence already had would not be sufficient to justify the rejection of the Bill. He was inclined, therefore, to support the Motion of the noble Marquess, more especially as there was criminatory matter contained in the Report.

After a short conversation, in which the Earl of Besborough, the Marquess of Clanricarde, Lord Stanley, Lord Redesdale, and Earl Bathurst took part, debate adjourned to Monday next; the evidence taken before the said Committee ordered to be laid before the House.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS AND PAUPER LUNATICS BILL.] On the Motion of Lord Wharncliffe, the Pauper Lunatics and Lunatic Asylums Bill read 2ª.

On the Motion that it be committed to a Committee of the whole House, Lord Beaumont rose to put questions to the noble Lord (Lord Wharncliffe) preparatory to a Motion that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

Lord Wharncliffe said, that he should be prepared to answer any questions after the House was in Committee on the Bill.

Lord Beaumont persevered in putting his questions, founded on certain clauses in the Bill, under the expectation that the House would not resolve itself into the Committee until after the measure had been examined and amended by a Select Committee. He moved, therefore, that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee for the purpose.

After a remark from Lord Wharncliffe,

The House divided on Question, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question: — Contents 27; Non-contents 11: Majority 16.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

CRIMINAL LAW] The Lord Chancellor laid upon the Table the Eighth Report of the Commissioners on the Criminal Law, and in doing so, observed that it related to the most difficult and complicated branch of their whole inquiry, viz., to procedure. It concluded the labours of the Commissioners, who were appointed while his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham) held the Great Seal. He (the Lord Chancellor), therefore, had had nothing to do with the original choice of the learned persons; but he felt it his duty to bear willing testimony to the admirable manner in which they had discharged the task entrusted to them. It was impossible to read their Reports without being strongly sensible of the industry, intelligence, accuracy, and acuteness the Commissioners had displayed. They had treated every part of the subject at once in the most comprehensive and in the most detailed manner; and if it should be the pleasure of the House to legislate on the criminal law in the next Session, or on any future occasion, it would be quite unnecessary for their Lordships to apply to any other sources of information; they would find all comprised in the excellent volumes of the Commissioners. He, therefore, felt called upon to express his gratitude as one of the public for the eminent services they had rendered to their country; and his admiration of the learning, industry, and ability they had displayed.

Lord Brougham considered it unnecessary, and almost impertinent in him, after what had been so well said by his noble and learned Friend, to subjoin a word. It was true, that his noble and learned Friend had not appointed the Commissioners; but he had added some important and distinguished Members to the body; and among them Sir Edward Ryan, late Chief Justice of Bengal, Mr. Amos, and Mr. Vaughan Richards, the value of whose services was incalculable. Much was due to Mr. Starkie, one of the most eminent criminal lawyers this country had produced. He had given his aid most constantly, and with the utmost possible benefit. The whole of the Reports were now before the country; they formed a complete criminal code, and from them might be formed, without much difficulty, a digest of the criminal law. Little now remained but for the Legislature to reduce these invaluable volumes into the form of a Statute. Last year he (Lord Brougham) had introduced a Bill founded upon one of the Reports of the Commissioners, and to them it had been referred for revision and final opinion. He could not conclude these observations without remarking that, although the Commissioners were now functi officio, yet he must implore Her Majesty's Government, and especially his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, not to omit this opportunity of securing the services of these Commissioners (others might perhaps be found, but none could be better), by forming them into a board for the systematic revision of all the Statutes submitted to Parliament, including, also, all Private Acts, in whose dark corners much that was highly objectionable often lurked, and remained undetected until too late. Nothing could more tend to facilitate the labours of the Judges than such a simplification of the criminal law as might now be accomplished; and he threw out the proposition of a board for the consideration of Ministers during the ensuing long vacation.

Lord Campbell, concurring entirely in the opinions just expressed, of the value of these Reports, expressed a wish that they might not, like other blue books, be laid upon the Table, and allowed to remain there until they were covered with dust. There was not a country of the Continent that had not had its criminal law reduced into form, and published for the benefit of those who were either to administer or to obey it. There was now no reason why the people of this Empire should not enjoy the same advantage; and he trusted that this just reproach upon our legislation would soon be wiped away, and that a criminal code would be prepared for Great Britain.

The Lord Chancellor added, that when he said a few minutes ago that the Commissioners had closed their labours, he meant only to refer to the object for which they were first appointed. They had, however, other matters before them, particularly a Bill in which a noble and learned Lord now gazing at him felt a peculiar interest. The Commissioners were also considering the manner in which the country might practically avail itself of their Reports.

Lord Brougham agreed, that it was most unfit to allow these Reports to become covered with dust: in order to prevent it, he had last year reduced one of the Reports of the Commissioners into the form of a Bill, which was at present under the revision of the Commissioners. He hoped that Ministers would bring it forward next Session; and, supported by their weight and authority, it could not fail of success. If they did not, he gave notice that if he were spared, he would, and his only doubt was, whether the system of our criminal law ought or ought not, like that of France, to be divided into two parts, one of which was called "Le Code Final," and the other "Le Code de Procédure Criminel."

Report ordered to lie on the Table.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, July 25, 1845.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. By Mr. Lockhart, from Inverleithen, and Traquair, for Better Observance of the Lord's Day.—By Mr. Darby, from Clergy of Lewes, against Union of Saint Asaph and Bangor.—By Mr. C. Buller, from Stockholders of New South Wales, for Repeal of certain Acts relating to that Colony.—By Mr. Denison, from Relatives of Settlers in New Zealand, for a Change of Policy towards that Colony.—By Mr. Darby, Viscount Newport, Mr. Newdegate, and Mr. Spooner, for Relief from Agricultural Taxation.—By Mr. Darby, from several places, for Repeal of the Malt Duty.—By Viscount Jocelyn, from Belfast, for Alteration of Law relating to Appraisers (Ireland).—By Mr. G. W. Hope, from Southampton, for Establishment of County Courts.—By Mr. Bankes, from several places, in favour of the Ten Hours System in Factories.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

CORPORATE PRIVILEGES (SCOTLAND).] Mr. Hume put the question of which he had given notice, namely, what was the intention of the Government as to the removal of the vexatious and exclusive privileges of trading, and the exercise of crafts enjoyed by the incorporated trades in the burghs of Scotland?

The Lord Advocate said, the Report of the Commissioners inclined towards the abolition of these exclusive privileges; and as great weight was due to their opinion, it had made a strong impression on his mind that there was not that necessity for these privileges which once existed; he thought that, to some extent, inconvenience was caused by them. On the other hand, it was proper he should state, that interests of a charitable nature had grown up which were connected with the preservation of these rights; but the Report did not state what was their extent. It would be necessary to be cautious in dealing with such matters.

THE CHARITABLE BEQUESTS ACT (IRELAND).] Mr. Sheil begged to put a question to the Home Secretary, of which he had given him notice. His noble Friend the Member for Arundel had on a former occasion put a question to the same effect; but the answer then given to him by the right hon. Baronet was not considered in Ireland to be as explicit as it should have been: he, therefore, wished to ask the right hon. Baronet whether it were the intention of the Government, early in the next Session, to bring in a Bill to amend the Charitable Bequests Act?

Sir J. Graham said, he was most anxious that the answer should be explicit. It was expedient that it should be so; and he thanked the hon. Gentleman for having given him notice of the question. There were two points as to which he proposed to alter the Bill next Session. The first related to matters affecting the doctrine and discipline of the Roman Catholic Church. By the Act as it now stood, if there was a bequest in favour of a dignitary of the Roman Catholic Church, or of a parish priest, and a dispute arose as to the title of the party claiming it, such a case was now, as the Act stood, referred to the decision of the Commissioners. It appeared, however, that by a canon of the Roman Catholic Church, such a question must be decided by an authority exclusively ecclesiastic. The Government intended to remove that difficulty by making the certificate of the ecclesiastical authority conclusive as to the rights of the parties. The next point as to which the Government proposed to make an alteration, was this:—the monastic orders in Ireland considered themselves injured by one of the provisoes at the end of the 15th Clause. He had stated when he introduced the Bill, that it was not intended, either directly or indirectly, to affect the position of the monastic orders. Whether that was or was not carried out in the Bill, it was the intention of the Government explicitly to declare that the monastic orders were not affected by the enactments of the Bill. There was also another point as to which it was intended to vary the enactments of the Act of last Session. By that Act, the Law of Mortmain was extended to Ireland, where, in fact, it operated with more weight than it did in this country; so that it was impossible for a party to leave any quantity of land, however small, for the site of a chapel, glebe house, or hospital. The Government proposed to relax this provision so as to allow land, not exceeding five acres, for instance, to be left for such purposes. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would think this answer sufficiently explicit.

Subject at an end.

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.] Mr. P. M. Stewart rose, pursuant to notice, to call the attention of the House to the petition of the Rev. Patrick Macfarlan, Moderator of the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland (presented June 24), complaining of the refusal of sites to congregations of that Church. He stated that the petitioners represented that the General Assembly of the Free Church had the spiritual guidance of one-third of the population of Scotland; that 470 of the clergy of the Church of Scotland had left it for the Free Church, which now had 620 clergy and 800 congregations; that 726,000*l.* had been subscribed for the general purposes of the separation, of which 300,000*l.* had been appropriated to the building of churches. They further stated that the landlords refused to allow them to purchase sites for their churches. Owing to the land being in large quantities in few hands, this refusal operated as a great hardship upon them. The congregations had no place in which to meet for worship, so that they were obliged to go into the high roads or under the hedges to perform their devotions. All that the petitioners wanted was permission to purchase land for sites for their churches at a fair and equitable price, but this was refused to them. The hon. Member proceeded to mention some cases where the refusal of sites had operated as a hardship on congregations. In one place in Rossshire, where the parish occupied an area of twenty miles, such was the spiritual destitution of a portion of the district, that the Government had gone to the expense of erecting a church. There was a case in point in a locality which must be known to the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham), namely, Canoby; he felt certain, however, that the right hon. Baronet would never have been the author of such sufferings. The congregation consisted of 500 people, all of whom had been compelled to betake themselves to the high road in order to engage in religious worship. The hon. Member read a letter from the Rev. Mr. Guthrie, the minister of the congregation, who stated that the most sacred ordinances of religion had been dispensed in the open air; and that he had seen 500 persons at once, who, in consequence of exposure to sleet and snow, were as wet as if they had been dragged through the river Esk, which rolled at their feet. There were three men in particular, it was alleged, whose countenances bore the stamp of death; and indeed the weather was bad enough to hurry them to that place "where the wicked cease from troubling, and where the weary are at rest." Such were the sad statistics of many parishes and of thousands of parishioners in Scotland at this moment. It was only justice to those who were the proprietors of the districts where such scenes occurred, to suppose that they did not know the full extent of the miseries endured, for otherwise the remedy sought would surely come from them. He trusted that the House, the Government, and the proprietors, would assist in bringing about a better state of things. Viewing the matter simply as one of temporal policy, if districts twenty miles square in extent grew disorganized in consequence of the people not being able to attend church as they had formerly done, what but calamity could be the result? He might refer to the city of Westminster as affording an illustration of what he meant. The House might not be aware that they were sitting at that moment in one of the most dark and destitute portions of the metropolis. It was, however, proved by statistics which had been verified, that the greatest evils had arisen in the parishes of St. John and St. Margaret, Westminster, from a state of things, unopposed, similar to that which then existed in many parts of Scotland. Were the Government aware that in those two parishes, for a population of 56,000 persons, there were sittings in the Established Church for only 7,000, and in the Dissenting chapels for 6,000, making altogether 13,000 sittings, of which 5,000 were never occupied? The obstacles to the Dissenters procuring building leases were so formidable that they could not obtain sites for chapels without incurring very great expense. Although the Dean and Chapter of these parishes received upwards of 30,000*l.* a year, they did not instruct daily as many as 3,000 souls out of a population of 56,000. There was a clause in their leases precisely similar to that with which they were threatened in Scotland, against the erection of any Dissenting place of worship, or the use of any tenement for Dissenting purposes. Freeholds were only to be obtained at very great cost. Within the last fortnight it had been ascertained by a city missionary, that there were 2,000 families, including a population of 10,000 souls, unpossessed of a single page of the Scriptures. Thousands of the children were uneducated; poverty, wretchedness, irreligion, and crime abounded; and he had been assured that day, by a most benevolent individual who strove to relieve this mass of misery, that such was the demoralized condition of the district, owing to the slumbering state of the Church and the exclusion of Dissenting aid, that there were various places where they would not be even personally safe. He merely mentioned this as an illustration of the effect of not giving a fair field to all denominations. Two Sundays ago there were 600 shops open in Westminster between the hours of nine and eleven in the morning, 200 of which were public houses. It must be remembered, too, that the leases which positively excluded Dissenting places of worship, contained no prohibitory clause against houses for immoral purposes; and there were, in fact, upwards of 130 such houses under the very eye of the Dean and Chapter themselves. Now, such, he repeated, was the state of things with which they were threatened in Scotland. The only reason which he could imagine as influencing those who refused to grant sites, was the expectation of a change in the feelings of the people; but to talk of change in a matter of that kind was proved by the history of Scotland to be absurd. He would recommend the Government to look at public opinion on this subject. As a Scotchman, he naturally felt warm and indignant on such a topic; but he would quote the opinion of two persons who might be in a better position to pronounce a judgment. The first was that of a distinguished East Indian friend of his, who had been engaged in the late glorious transactions in Cabul. That gentleman said he could hardly believe the facts which were alleged. In the Punjaub, the Sikhs, who were a sort of degenerate Hindoos, although they hated the Mussulmans, allowed them to build mosques in every part of the country; and in Cabul itself, which was the focus of Mahomedanism, there were Hindoo chapels. Toleration prevailed to such an extent that those who hated each other most cordially, did not prevent the erection of temples by their adversaries for religious worship. The second opinion to which he would refer was that of M. Merle D'Aubigné, who having recently visited this country, was now on his way to Switzerland. In writing to Dr. Chalmers, M. D'Aubigné said—

"I will tell you frankly, dear and venerable brother, that this refusal of sites is, perhaps, the only painful impression which I carry away from Scotland. A foreigner comes into a land as into that of the gospel and liberty; and he sees there, things which are not to be met with under the most despotic Government of the Continent. How can this denial of religious liberty accord with the national character of Scotland?"

Such was the view taken of this matter by the historian of the Protestant Reformation. But he would not enter further into this painful subject. He had been asked why he brought this matter before Parliament? The General Assembly of the Free Church would not have come there had they not exhausted every other means of obtaining shelter and protection for those under their care. They came to that House as the guardians and representatives of the sufferers. He hoped that the result would be that the thousands and tens of thousands whom they represented would not be again exposed to the miseries which they had heretofore endured; but would be admitted to the free enjoyment of that toleration which was once a great element and a bright ornament of the Constitution under which they lived.

Sir J. Graham said: The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has rightly designated this subject as a painful one; and I cannot say that I think the hon. Gentleman at all to blame for calling our attention to it. It is quite clear that it is a subject on which legislation is not possible—one with which public opinion is alone competent to deal. The hon. Gentleman has mentioned certain facts with reference to the parishes of St. Margaret and St. John, in this immediate vicinity, showing that there is great spiritual destitution, great want of religious instruction in the district. I have not the means either of verifying or of contradicting his assertions; I can only express my deep regret if the statements are well founded, and my earnest desire that, in that case, a speedy remedy may be provided for evils so injurious to the welfare of society. I now apply myself to the subject matter of this petition. I am sure the hon. Gentleman and the House will do me the justice to remember that upon no occasion when the subject of the recent disruption of the Church of Scotland has been brought under our consideration, have I failed to express my heartfelt and deep regret at an event which I consider most deplorable, and which has made a fatal inroad upon the happiness and peace of that country. I deplore what has occurred as deeply and as earnestly as it is possible to lament any public event. I cannot but bear in mind that the great body of proprietors in Scotland are Episcopalian, and that there has never been on the part of the authorities of the Presbyterian Church before the disruption took place, any jealousy of Episcopalians, or any wish that they should not enjoy the utmost toleration in the exercise of their religion. I quite concur in the sentiment contained in this petition, that the meanest peasant in the country is equally entitled to all the benefits of toleration, and to the free exercise of his religion, without let or hindrance, with the proudest, the richest, and the most extensive proprietor. I must also mention another circumstance adverted to in this petition, which is, I think, very important. I mean the circumstance that this dissent, fatal and extensive as unhappily it is, after all, arises not from any difference with respect to the fundamentals or essentials of the Christian faith, but from a difference with respect to a matter of discipline, which, though important indeed in itself, is, as compared with doctrine, light as dust in the balance. Having expressed my opinion on these two preliminary points, I will own to the hon. Gentleman and to the House, that I have not been careful to examine the particular facts set forth in this petition with respect to the refusal of sites. I know not whether there has been any exaggeration in this petition; but I do fear that, in the heat, and, perhaps, I might add, the anger consequent on so sudden a breach in so great an establishment, there may have been, as the first not unnatural effect of such a disruption, a refusal in many cases to grant sites where, perhaps, a strict justification of that refusal might be difficult. But I must say, I do not think the blame is exclusively on one side; for, though, on the one hand, I cannot think that such a state of things as the hon. Member has described can, in a Christian country and in the present age be justified; on the other hand, many landlords have been publicly assailed, in the midst of the sacred ordinances of religion, with the most unseemly rancour; and, of course, in consequence of these attacks, their feelings have been excited to exasperation. But when it is remembered, that the cause of quarrel leading to these fatal results was originally light and trivial—trivial, I say, when compared with matters of faith and doctrine—hopes might have been entertained that the disruption might not have been permanent, and that the differences were capable of adjustment; but these hopes in the lapse of time have vanished; and, as these hopes have vanished, the necessity for toleration becomes greater; and it might have been expected by those who have gone out of the Establishment, that this indisposition to grant sites for places of worship would have passed away. However, the petition acknowledges that sites have already been granted in cases where they had been refused before. The evil, therefore, of itself is passing away. Of this petition I must say this, that the prayer is most reasonable. It states what is the desire of the petitioners. The petitioners desire that they may be at liberty to purchase sites for their churches, in order that their congregations may assemble together for divine worship in circumstances of decent comfort, without let or hindrance. Now, I must say, that if I were a Scotch proprietor I should feel disposed to grant this request. But I am bound in justice to state, that that is not the request which has been made in many cases to the Scotch proprietors. The demand has been made to obtain sites for the seceding Church in immediate proximity to the Church of the Establishment, for the purpose of ostentatious rivalry. Now if I were a Scotch proprietor, friendly to the Establishment, I could not grant that request. I should endeavour to restrain that spirit of hostility in its most offensive form, which seeks to place the Secession Church opposite to the Established Church; and I must say, I believe that sites offered with a view to general convenience have been refused, and it has been said, "We will have our sites close to the Established Church;" and if that was the claim, I say again, I, as a Scotch proprietor, should resist; but I am not a Scotch proprietor, and in what I am stating I should be very sorry to be supposed to speak in an angry spirit to the members of the Secession. Something has been said with respect to one of my Colleagues, the Lord Privy Seal. Now, I am sure that there is not a kinder, a more generous, or more noble person; and I know by experience that he is desirous, in all his decisions respecting his property, to do what is satisfactory to his neighbours. With respect to another of my Colleagues against whom the tide of religious dissent has set with violence—I mean Lord Aberdeen—I can only say, that within six weeks of the secession having taken place, and when hopes of reconciliation were no longer rational, my noble Friend did provide a site for one of these churches on his estate, without difficulty, and offered it in a manner most satisfactory to all; and this was the first site, I believe, that was granted in Scotland to the Secession Church by any landed proprietor. On the whole, I think each case must be decided with reference to its own peculiar circumstances—with reference to the number of Dissenters in the parish, and in some degree also with reference to the facilities for attending places of worship in the neighbourhood. Speaking generally, the prayer of this petition, I think, is reasonable; and although I am afraid the hope of a return to the Establishment is diminishing, still, taking all circumstances conjointly, I entertain the most sanguine hope that there will be no ground of complaint against the Scotch proprietors in future on account of the refusal of sites. I hope the hon. Gentleman will have no cause to regret having introduced this discussion, and I should be very glad that anything falling from me should have the happy effect of diminishing irritation on this subject. I cannot hope that reconciliation is any longer possible; but I do hope and expect that toleration will be practised, and every facility for public worship be afforded by the landed proprietors of Scotland to their dissenting brethren and neighbours.

Mr. Hawes held in his hand a pamphlet containing statements of the most painful and humiliating character, in reference to the refusal of sites; but it did not appear that any of the proprietors who refused sites assigned the reason given by the right hon. Baronet. On the contrary, the factor or agent of the proprietor assumed to himself the right of fixing the place in which the church should be built, and in many cases sites were granted for Roman Catholic Chapels, while they were refused for the Free Church of Scotland. A petition from the people of Eigg, addressed to the proprietors, and worded in the most simple and touching manner, was answered by a long communication filled with cold and unpitying sarcasm, and denying their request. He thought it would be productive of great mischief to exasperate by such refusals the minds of the people of Scotland.

Mr. Cardwell thought it his duty to vindicate the character of Dr. M'Pherson, the principal landed proprietor on the Island of Eigg, from the charge of religious intolerance; such feelings were wholly alien from his character. There were circumstances which rendered him unwilling to grant a site, but the unwillingness did not arise from religious intolerance.

Mr. Hume expressed himself highly gratified with the statement of the right hon. Baronet, and hoped that ere long religious rancour and hostility would be entirely done away with in Scotland.

Mr. Sheil understood from some of his Scotch Friends that the Seceders in Scotland were rapidly becoming the majority. It was incumbent on the Government to guard against the growth of disaffection among them. The Government should take into consideration whether it was not far wiser to prevent in time the great calamity which was impending over Scotland, and, instead of relying on the discretion, or, he should rather say, the caprice of individual proprietors, to take measures for providing for the religious worship of the majority of the Scottish people, and to attach them to the State by honourable bonds. If the regium donum were given to the Presbyterians of Ireland, it seemed to him anomalous to withhold a similar grant from the Free Church. The Government should make terms of the most satisfactory kind with the Scotch. He believed the Scotch Church did not refuse endowments. It might, perhaps, be considered indecorous in him to meddle with what was going on in Scotland; but he had seen so many disasters in his own country, arising from the alienation of the Church from the State, that he thought the Government should adopt some such expedient in reference to the Free Church as that he had mentioned. If houses and chapels were to be built for Roman Cathiolc priests, it was not right to allow the members of the Free Church to remain in a condition which excited feelings of religious rancour between them and the proprietors.

Mr. Pringle said, the statements of his hon. Friend, the Member for Renfrewshire were entirely ex parte. The proprietors of land referred to, had strong reasons for refusing the sites required. The secession had not been near so numerous as had been stated. He would caution the House not to give any credit to ex parte statements on this subject.

M. Hindley expressed his satisfaction at the separation that had taken place between the Free Church and the Established Church in Scotland. He thought that the results of that separation showed the power of the voluntary principle. He was glad to see the extension of the voluntary principle as well as its complete success, and he wished to see that principle extend to all parts of the United Kingdom. He regretted that some individuals had interfered in an unsatisfactory manner with respect to the Free Church. He was happy to say, that even in Westminster, schools in connexion with the voluntary principle were in a flourishing condition, and gave an excellent education to a large number of children. He was anxious to see the extension of the voluntary principle.

Mr. Borthwick said, that when so much was stated with respect to the voluntary principle in educating the poor, the exertions of the Established Church ought not to be overlooked with respect to a question of this kind. He had taken a great interest in this subject, and had seen the useful and advantageous education which was given by the Established Church to the poor of this country. He regretted that any observations should have been made respecting the conduct which certain noble Lords had pursued on this subject. He thought, after the public statements that had been made by those individuals, it would be impertinent for him to make any observations on the subject. He was sure, that the defence which had been made by those noble individuals would be found perfectly satisfactory to the public.

Discussion terminated.

LIGHT GOLD—THE CURRENCY.] Mr. Spooner presented petitions from farmers in Warwickshire, complaining of agricultural distress; and from Mr. Taunton, of Birmingham, complaining of the errors of our existing system of currency.

Mr. Newdegate also presented petitions from farmers in Warwickshire, to the same effect as those presented by Mr. Spooner.

Mr. Spooner subsequently rose, and said that he had a petition to present from a most respectable individual, Mr. Andrew Spottiswoode, who had signed a petition as Chairman of the Society for the Emancipation of Industry. The members of that Society traced the extreme depression, so much to be deplored among agriculturists in this country, and prominently among them the labourers, mainly to the present state of the national currency. The petitioner prayed that an inquiry might be instituted to ascertain the cause of the distress.

Ordered to lie on the Table.

On the Motion that the Order of the Day be read, for the House to go into Committee of Supply,

Mr. Hume called the attention of the House to the loss to the public by light sovereigns, and that some offices should be appointed by the Government to receive light gold at the intrinsic value, according to the number of grains deficient in the average weight, and not allow the loss of 6*d.*, more or less, to the holder of the coin, according to the will of the person who was to receive the coin. The proclamation issued some time ago, relative to light gold, subjected the public to a loss of from 4*d.* to 6*d.*, or even more, on sovereigns which were deficient in weight; and this loss fell principally upon the poorer classes. Supposing the deduction on each light sovereign to be 6*d.*, the loss sustained by the public would be 75,000*l.* a year. Unless some alteration was made in the present system, he was convinced that a general desire would be excited to return to the system of 1*l.* notes, which would enable persons to avoid the loss they now incurred upon bullion. It was entirely owing to the negligence and carelessness of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the loss to which he referred had been sustained by the public. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was quite callous to his appeals, for he had brought forward this subject three or four times, and the right hon. Gentleman had never thought fit to notice it. He would now, however, move a Resolution in the nature of a vote of censure upon that right hon. Gentleman for his negligence, which he hoped would have the effect of leading him to bestow some attention on this important subject. He begged to move that—

"An humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to represent that, on the last occasion, when the light gold coin of the Realm was called in, a considerable loss, attended with much inconvenience to Her Majesty's poorer subjects, occurred, having been in a great degree caused by the neglect of Her Majesty's Ministers, in not making timely preparations for receiving the light gold coin at its intrinsic value at convenient places in the several towns and districts of the United Kingdom, and humbly to request that Her Majesty will be pleased to give directions to guard against similar scenes of loss and trouble for the future."

Mr. Spooner seconded the Motion, and said the hon. Member for Montrose had brought a very important Motion before the House. He had fully made out his case, and had shown that the poor man had been greatly injured by what he had justly styled the neglect of Her Majesty's Government. But there was a large and important class to whom the hon. Member had not alluded, viz., shopkeepers and retail dealers in general. Competition compelled them to receive light coin at its nominal value; but they had no means of disposing of it but in payment of the debts they had incurred in the purchase of goods. Then the loss between intrinsic and nominal value was tested, and fell on them. This could not be avoided; for if the Government were to take in the light coin at its nominal value, it would open extensive doors to fraud; but in addition to this loss, the holders of the light coin were subjected to the risk and expense of transmission to London. That risk and expense the Goverment ought to bear. A place ought to be appointed in the centre of every important district, where light sovereigns might be exchanged. He hoped that the present Motion would be the means of calling the attention of the Government to the subject. But important as the Motion was, it was only part, and a comparatively small part, of that great and momentous subject—the monetary system of the country. He approached this question with much diffidence; he could not forget what passed last Session, when his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, holding up a book, denounced its contents as nonsense—denounced also the borough which he (Mr. Spooner) had the honour to represent, as being the only town where two men could be found to write such nonsense. Agreeing with nearly every part of that book, he was willing to take a due share of the obloquy attempted to be thrown upon it. With regard to the authorship, he had nothing to do with it; nor did he even know, when the papers first appeared in a periodical, who was the author; and would, therefore, not assume a merit which did not belong to him. If, however, that book contained nonsense, he had the consolation to know that it was nonsense which had received the sanction of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department. That right hon. Gentleman had, in the year 1826, published a book containing the same principles, and enforcing the same views, which the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government had so stigmatized. His (Mr. Spooner's) object in calling the attention of the House to this subject, was to point out what he believed to be the situation of the country at the present moment. They had succeeded in bringing back gold, manufactures and commerce were flourishing—agriculture alone was depressed. On former similar occasions, some time after these evidences of returning confidence and commercial prosperity, the prices of agricultural produce began to rise; and whenever they became high, all other things advanced beyond the continental level of prices; gold became the cheapest article of export, the export of manufactures ceased, and panic ensued. He believed they were now approaching a similar crisis. He formed that opinion from a review of the past, which was the best index for the future. To take this review effectually, they must begin with the year 1797. Previous to that year, a very great and long-continued depreciation had been going on; gold had been gradually leaving the country; paper was increasingly substituted in its stead, till, in 1797, the gold was all gone, when measure was adopted by Mr. Pitt, which the right hon. Baronet had also denounced, and called a "fatal" measure. What were the circumstances under which that measure was passed? What were the measures which the right hon. Baronet would have substituted? A mutiny at the Nore, all Continental alliances broken up—single-handed was this nation left to contend against the revolutionary spirit which overwhelmed the whole of Europe. The master-mind of Pitt called forth the credit of the country, aroused its latent energies, established that system which enabled the country to conclude a long and expensive war on the glorious field of Waterloo, and to dictate peace within the walls of Paris. A fatal measure! If there was anything fatal in the measure, it was that it fell to be carried out by statesmen who were incapable of understanding it, and committed the very blunders which the great master-mind who framed it feared they would fall into. In proof that Mr. Pitt did foresee the danger, he would read an extract from a book which was of very high value, which he esteemed himself fortunate in possessing, because it was now a very scarce book, and what was most remarkable was, that the scarcity of the book came all at once. It was formerly in all booksellers' shops; now, not a single copy was to be had. ["Name!"] The name of the book was—"Graham on Corn and Currency." [The hon. Member then read the extract, which was to the effect that Pitt deprecated equally an unlimited currency and a sudden contraction.] The successors of Pitt, the hon. Member said, fell into both errors. Ignorant of the mighty power which they had to wield, they first unconsciously depreciated to an extent they did not contemplate, and thus found the means of supporting the large expenditure of the war; at the conclusion of which, reckless of all consequences, they suddenly contracted the circulation, and enormously enhanced the value of money. In 1810 and 1811, Committees of the House sat on this subject. He knew not if hon. Members had read their Reports; but being convinced that the subject would soon force itself upon the consideration of the House again, he would exhort hon. Members to make themselves complete masters of those Reports. On these Committees sat some of the ablest men on the opposite side of the House, and they stated what he thought was a mere truism—but which was strenuously opposed by hon. Members on this side—that the currency was greatly depreciated, and that that depreciation ought to be marked and arrested. The Government met this proposition by the monstrous Resolution, that a pound note and a shilling were equal to a guinea, though it was well known that light ones were then selling for 25*s*. Ay, Lord Bexley denied the existence at any time of any fixed unvarying standard of value. So we went on to the end of the war, and in 1815 great preparations were made for returning to a metallic currency. This produced universal distress. This distress evinced itself in the low price of manufactures, which, from their low price, found their way into foreign markets, and brought back gold. Gold thus flowing back, confidence was restored, and the country began to return to a state of prosperity. In 1819 the Bill was introduced, which the right hon. Gentleman would forgive him for designating by the epithet which he had given to the measure of Mr. Pitt. That was a fatal measure; for we were called upon to return, not merely to the old standard of value, but to a standard at least 15 per cent. higher than it had ever been before in this country. The old standard was a joint standard of gold and silver, and gave the option to the debtor to pay in either. The coin was also protected by heavy penalties from being melted or exported. Coin may now be melted or exported at the will of the holder. I do not say that this change might not be a proper one; but, inasmuch as it gave an increased value to the coin, the coin itself ought to have been depreciated to have met that increased value. Under the plea of keeping faith with the creditor, there was a breach of faith with the debtor, for he was called upon to pay in a higher standard than had ever existed before. But there was a greater breach of faith than that. By the Resolution of 1811, all persons had been led to make their engagements under the conviction that the pound in which their contracts were made and their dealings took place, was the ancient pound sterling; that there had been no departure from the ancient standard; and, therefore, it was impossible for them to contemplate a return to that from which there had been no departure. At the close of the war, Government, composed of men of the same political party who had thus deluded them into the belief that the standard had never been departed from, now called upon them to pay their engagements in what was falsely called the ancient standard of value. [Here, Sir James Graham having returned, the hon. Member repeated what he before said about his book, and asked the right hon. Baronet where copies of his book could be had?] Afterwards came the distress of 1820-1-2, which, in 1822, had produced such discontent and alarm, that the late Lord Londonderry came down to the House, and truly assigned the distress of the country to the operation of the Bill of 1819; and introduced several measures extending the currency, and departing from the principle of the Bill. These measures were successful, and the distress of the country was relieved. But the Bill itself was not repealed; and, not being repealed, the prosperity so produced was only temporary, and in the end produced the panic of 1825, which few who witnessed it would forget till their dying day. But he (Mr. Spooner) remembered that in the June before, the present Lord Ripon, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, gave a most glowing description of the prosperity of the country at that time; and warned Mr. Brougham, who had a notice of Motion for reform in Parliament, to remember that that prosperity had been dealt out to the people through the ancient portals of the Constitution. That same noble Lord, in the month of February, 1826, came down to the House deploring the heavy calamity which had overtaken the country; and that calamity he attributed to great speculation produced by the excessive issues of country bankers. The father of the present hon. Member for Chichester, clearly and strongly exposed, at the time, the absurdity of this opinion, and its inconsistency with the noble Lord's statement a few months before. Prosperity in 1825, had been restored in the way it had ever been; the price of our manufactures having been forced down to a ruinous extent, again found a market on the Continent, and bullion flowed into the country. The effects of the panic of 1825 were long felt; and prosperity was not restored till our manufactures having again been reduced, the same results followed. In 1837, the American panic took place, which was but short in itself, and was followed by the short-lived prosperity of 1838; for in 1839 the Bank of England was compelled to borrow gold from the Bank of France. In 1842, prosperity began to return; and the right hon. Baronet, who saw these things as clearly as any man in the House, fearing lest the return of prosperity should again be followed, as it had always been, by panic, brought forth his Bill of 1844, "a complement," as he called it, to the Act of 1819:—a measure, which at the time it passed, and frequently at subsequent periods, had been erroneously designated as a final measure—one that had for ever settled the question of the currency. Where, then, the finality of the measure of 1819, if it required such "a complement?" He (Mr. Spooner) admitted, that if the Bill of 1819 was right, that of 1844 was necessary. The object of that complement to the Bill, was to limit the currency within such bounds as would prevent prices rising above the level of those of the Continent, and so to keep gold from leaving the country. He doubted if it would work; if it did, it could only be by permanently reducing prices to the level of the Continent. And he particularly called the attention of hon. Members connected with the landed interest to this point. The hon. Member then read the following extract from Sir James Graham's book:—

"With confidence I assert that the law which fixes the standard of value at 3*l.* 17*s.* 10½*d.*, and compels payment of paper in specie on demand, establishes also 50*s.* the quarter as the average maximum for wheat in a series of years. It is shown by the Eton College tables, that, for 150 years prior to 1793, the average price of wheat, calculated in periods of ten years, was about 51*s.* the quarter. With the same standard we must have the same price; there is no escape from the dilemma; and if the landowners would preserve their estates, either the standard must be adjusted to their incumbrances, or their incumbrances to the standard."

Now his (Mr. Spooner's) opinion was, that there was no remedy except through a complete investigation of this question, and an abandonment of the principle of the Bill of 1819. He had watched for an opportunity to bring this subject under the consideration of the House, and had hoped to have been able to have done so upon some one of the various occasions when the difficulties of agriculture were under discussion. But, owing to the great number of speakers, and the late hours to which the debates were protracted, he had not been able so to do. But being thoroughly convinced that a continuance of the present system must produce a return of panics so much to be deprecated, he thought it his duty to state his opinions to the House, not with the view of recommending at that time any remedy, but with the hope of inducing hon. Members to investigate the subject. He believed that the immense mass of gold which had been attracted to this country would not long lie dormant. Speculation had already begun in railway shares; in 1825, it was in foreign mines, and therefore was sooner felt; but it would be the same thing over again: confidence would be restored, the prices of manufactures would rise, and there would be an end to our export trade. The state of the iron trade within the last few weeks, proves the accuracy of this view; the price of iron had rapidly risen, and almost immediate countermand of orders for goods manufactured of iron, took place on the part of exporting merchants. It was a remarkable fact; but all who had watched the course of events as he had for the last thirty years, were aware that, under the existing system, manufactures, commerce, and agriculture never permanently simultaneously flourished; and here let him address a few words to the advocates of free trade. What would be the effect of a free import of corn? A corresponding export of bullion. The demand for our manufactures would not instantly be created in countries whence we should draw our supplies of free corn: it must be the result of long commercial intercourse. Habits of consumption must be created before demand arises: this could only be done by making them rich, and ourselves poor. The effect of this drain of bullion would be first felt severely by the manufacturing interest. Money would become scarce, and credit embarrassingly restricted. The commercial interest, as an interest, would recover; many would be ruined, but new firms would rise; and the pressure would ultimately and permanently lie on the agricultural interest, whose incumbrances could not be shaken off, while the value of their estates would be completely changed. Nobody would benefit but the capitalists; and if the system of the right hon. Baronet could be permanently established, and gold kept in the country at the standard present price, it must be by sacrificing the agricultural to the money interest; but should this system fail, there would be such a panic as had never before been experienced. In all former panics, there had been a safety valve for the Bank of England; that safety valve by the "complement" of 1844 had been destroyed. A demand for gold first arose from a turn in the exchanges; in self-defence the Bank was obliged to make money scarce to bring back the gold. This created distress in the monied world, confidence was destroyed, and then was created panic, and another and far more extensive demand for gold. As soon as the exchanges turned, and gold again began to come in, the Bank merely increased its issues, in order to restore confidence, and arrest the drain which had arisen from panic. It could not do so now; it could not issue notes upon the expectation of gold; it must wait till the gold had actually returned. Before he concluded, he would just advert to what he considered a prevalent and dangerous error. Many who agreed with him respecting the character of the measure of 1819, imagined that its effects were all over. Upon this point he begged to quote from a work that had just appeared, written by Mr. Alison, who, in his judgment, and in the judgment of many others, was a high authority on the subject; and upon this point he said:—

"It is often said, that the Bill of 1819 was a great error; but that it has been got over; that prices have become accommodated to the new scale; that the sufferers by it are bankrupt, dead, and buried; and that every thing would be thrown into confusion again if any change were now made. There never was a greater mistake. The 700,750,000*l.* of the National Debt has not become accommodated to the change. The 1,000,000,000*l.* of private debt in the community has not found its debtors inured to the change. The payers of taxes whose incomes have been lowered 50 per cent. by its effects, have not become reconciled to the change. The manufacturing and commercial classes, exposed every five or six years to a frightful monetary crisis, fatal to a large part of the persons engaged in business, in consequence of the present obligation of the Bank to pay in specie at the Mint price, are not enamoured of it. The farmers, who find the prices received for their produce lowered from 50 to 75 per cent., are not reconciled to it. The landlords, whose embarrassments are hourly increasing, and one half of whom are in a state of hopeless insolvency from the consequent and unavoidable reduction of their rents, are not accommodated to it. The nation, whose resources have been so seriously impaired by its effects, that any increase of revenue from indirect taxation has become impossible, and the ultima ratio of an income tax has become indispensable in the thirtieth year of peace, has not become accustomed to it. The evils of the system, as long as it is adhered to, are lasting, corroding, and irremovable. They are not over; they are only in their infancy."

The hon. Member thanked the House for their kind indulgence; he had honestly, although he was afraid, most imperfectly, expressed his opinions. Those opinions had not been hastily formed; they were the result of a close investigation of the subject, commencing in the year 1810. One remark only upon those opinions would he make—that they were at least consistent—he had never denied the existence of depreciation, but had always admitted it to its full extent. He could not be charged with having been one of those who, by asserting that the depreciated one pound note and a shilling were of equal value, for all legal purposes, to a guinea in gold, had induced the country to consent to taxation, individuals to enter into private contracts, and to charge their estates with family settlements and other incumbrances. Neither was he one of those who, having held and enforced these opinions, at the end of the war for the first time, admitted the depreciation, and on the plea of public faith required the payment of the depreciated pound in the gold sovereign at full weight and value, thus increasing every man's debt at least 50 per cent., and diminishing the value of his property in proportion. The hon. Gentleman concluded by seconding the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer declared himself to be totally unprepared to enter upon the whole question of currency as entered upon by the hon. Member, who had gone back to the year 1798, and had brought his ideas to bear upon all the events that had happened in the financial world from that period down to the present day. He did not at all suppose that the hon. Member could think it necessary to call upon the House to visit the present Government with its censure for measures which they had taken two years ago—measures which then met with the general approbation of the House, who appeared to be perfectly satisfied with the explanation then given by the Government. He should now confine his observations merely to the Motion before the House, and endeavour to state the difficulties which would attend the carrying out of the proposition of the hon. Member for Montrose. The hon. Member said that the Government had made no preparation for their measure of 1842 and 1843; but the hon. Member must be aware that since the year 1816 the public had been made aware of the constant depreciation of the gold currency that was going on from year to year by wear and tear. He must be aware that at one time a memorial had been presented to the Government, which was signed by every banker in the metropolis, calling upon them to apply some remedy to this evil; for that if it were not remedied it would lead to still greater evils. The condition of this country was then favourable to a change; and when the hon. Member said that there was no silver coin at the time in the country to meet the difficulty, he begged to remind him that but a few weeks before that general measure of the Government there was a general complaint made of the great accumulation of silver in the hands of the bankers, which was calculated to lead to great difficulties. Indeed, a suggestion had been made some years ago by Lord Althorp in respect to this subject, to withdraw the silver from circulation, and have it sold as bullion. For a period of about twenty-six years no notice had been taken of the wear and tear of the gold, during which period the practice of weighing it was discontinued, thereby giving a value to this money which it could not legally possess as current coin. The hon. Member said that no legal means were taken to protect the poor from the consequences of this change. He denied the fact—he did not mean to say that any effectual measure could be adopted that could prevent some evils from arising. Indeed, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) knew of a case where a poor man had carried a new sovereign to a shop, and, notwithstanding, he had been compelled to make the shopkeeper an allowance for short weight. The hon. Member for Montrose had indulged in some severe remarks upon himself (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) personally; in doing this he was quite aware that the hon. Member occasionally suffered himself to be carried beyond the bounds of justice under the influence of the moment; and he should, therefore, be perfectly prepared, when the hon. Member should, at some future opportunity, when no relevant topic offered itself, and when, indeed, some totally different subject was before the House, to hear from the hon. Member, incidentally, and by way of parenthesis, an ample apology for the harsh expressions he had used towards him that evening. But to revert to the point under consideration. The hon. Member must be quite aware that the Government could not establish scales for weighing coin in the manner pointed out by the hon. Member; for, if scales and weights were by law to be established in every town, what was there to prevent the inhabitants of villages and hamlets from calling for a similar institution in every petty village or hamlet throughout the country? The law declared that no coin under weight should be received. But, suppose a trader chose to say a coin was underweighted, and either refused to give his goods or to give change for a sovereign unless an allowance were made to him, how could the Government interfere to prevent such a proceeding? The difficulties, therefore, in the way were too great. There were no less than 500,000 sovereigns short of weight offered in the course of the year, and the complexity of such an arrangement as that proposed by the hon. Member was a full answer to his own proposal. But, as he had already stated, the Government had taken precautions to protect the poor. Orders had been given to all the postmasters throughout the kingdom to take light coin at a diminution of 3*d.* for each sovereign, if the person tendering it chose to part with his gold on those terms; and besides, every post-office was ordered to keep a weighing machine in order to detect light coin. Having said this, he trusted the House would agree with him in not deeming the present to be an occasion when the whole monetary system and all its collateral branches ought to be made the subject of a debate, and he ventured to entertain a hope that he had said all that was necessary to vindicate the conduct of the Government with respect to the particular subject of the Motion before the House.

Mr. W. Williams denied that the right hon. Gentleman had satisfactorily replied to the hon. Member for Montrose. No one who had not, like himself, been in the constant habit of receiving a most voluminous correspondence on the subject of light sovereigns could conceive the extent to which the labouring classes had suffered by that species of fraud or deterioration. There had been no public notices issued that the postmasters throughout the kingdom had orders to take all light coin at a loss of 3*d.* upon each sovereign.

Sir R. Peel: Sir, I am disappointed at being absent during the first part of the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham; but that part of it which I heard, convinced me that my hon. Friend has established another claim on the constituency which he represents. Some portions, however, of his speech do anything but bear out his argument; for while the one seems to be in favour of a convertible issue of paper money, the other is in favour of an inconvertible issue. My hon. Friend, however, proposes one remedy; he studiously avoids informing the House in respect to the practical result of his observations. He did indeed refer to the pamphlet of one whom he terms the greatest philosopher of modern times—Mr. Alison. I have the pamphlet in my hands, and what does it say? I shall read an extract or two to show the House what are the pretensions of that gentleman to instruct us on the currency question. I never knew who was the author of the letters of Gemini. A classical man would refer them to Castor and Pollux, but a Warwickshire man always attributes them to Spooner and Attwood. I doubt, however, if Mr. Alison is not entitled to the honours of the confraternity. Mr. Alison [the right hon. Baronet read the extract] recommends an unlimited issue of notes of 1*l.* in value by the Bank of England, with an obligation to pay them in gold and silver at the market price of those metals when presented. But, if that was adopted, gold would soon rise to 6*l.* an ounce, and bank notes of 1*l.* would become the standard of the country. Mr. Alison, however, provides, as he thinks, for this predicament, by suspending those payments in specie when the market price of gold should rise above a certain fixed limit. But suppose the price of gold rose to 10*l.* per ounce, the banks would, in that case, do nothing to depreciate their own paper; that nominal value of the precious metals would consequently be kept up; and as a matter of course, the period would never arrive when the price would fall below the assigned limit. This is the philosopher who is to instruct us on the currency. Now, I ask my hon. Friend when he next brings the currency question under the consideration of the House—it is too late for the hon. Gentleman to do so in this Session, but early next Session—I do hope he will give notice of his intention in the first place, and next that he will propose what he conceives a proper substitute for that Bill of 1819 to which my hon. Friend is so much opposed; and, lastly, that he will acquaint the House and the country with the way in which he would adjust those transactions which have grown up between debtor and creditor upon the basis of the old currency system.

Mr. A. Smith assured the House that his own experience amply verified the statements that had been made by the hon. Member for Montrose. The inconveniences that had been felt in consequence of the existing arrangements for changing the light coin were of no trifling character. He sincerely hoped that Government would make arrangements to obviate the evil. He wished also to say a few words on what had fallen from the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Spooner) with regard to the scarcity of silver. In the last twenty-five years, he (Mr. Abel Smith) had been in the habit of hearing continued complaints of this scarcity. He knew, for instance, that the large dock companies had very frequently found it next to impossible to get silver to pay their labourers. This, he believed, was mainly to be ascribed to a dispute that had long been going on between the Government and the Bank of England, as to whether the loss which ensued in the maintenance of the silver currency should be borne by the Government or by the Bank. He considered it most desirable, for the interests of the country, that this question should be set at rest.

Dr. Bowring thought nothing could be more unjust than that Government, after having altered the currency, should require individuals to bear the loss that ensued. He found, by some correspondence which had passed between Sir P. Stuart, the Governor of Malta, and the British Government, that when a depreciation in the currency had occurred in that Colony through the acts of Government, a loss of from 8,000*l.* to 9,000*l.* had been defrayed by Government. He conceived the present case was in all respects analogous to that he had just referred to. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that gold of light weight had been received at the Post Office without deduction; but why had not the same arrangement prevailed at other public offices? The inconvenience which resulted to the poor man, in consequence of this depreciation, was much more sensibly felt than was that which fell upon the rich, in consequence of the necessities of the former impelling him to make his purchases, subject to whatever reduction might be demanded. He hoped for the future the arrangements of Government would prevent this wide-spreading evil.

Mr. Newdegate said, that he was anxious to make a few remarks upon the highly important question now brought before the House; but must first of all clear himself and his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham from being held bound by the suggestion for an alteration of the currency, made by Mr. Alison at the conclusion of his pamphlet, as had been inferred by the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Treasury. To that proposal neither he nor his hon. Friend subscribed. They begged distinctly to disavow it. Mr. Alison himself, as shown by the quotation from his pamphlet read by the right hon. Baronet, laid very little stress upon that suggestion. That which was of real and very great value in Mr. Alison's pamphlet, was the historical review of the monetary policy pursued in this country during the last fifty years, and the synopsis of its effects, unto the present time; and he (Mr. Newdegate) thought that no hon. Member who had any knowledge of these circumstances would hastily cast aside the monitions of experience. He (Mr. Newdegate) felt convinced that this subject could not be much longer neglected, and from its great practical bearing upon the interests of commerce and of the country generally, he thought that any Legislature was defective whose commercial policy was uninfluenced by consideration of this important element. Day by day this subject, in one form or another, obtruded itself on their attention. Was not the difficulty in obtaining silver (which had been adduced by the hon. Member for Chichester that evening) evidence of the restricted state of our currency? Was not the loss to the community by wear and tear of our coins (which was the ground of the Motion now before the House), evidence of the expensive character of our monetary system. So long as the domestic trade of the Empire was kept in subjection to those stringent provisions which modern legislation had enforced upon the medium of exchange, so long ought our domestic trade to be a matter of the deepest concern to the House, for it was upon our internal commerce and upon the remuneration of labour that our present monetary system bore with peculiar severity. He (Mr. Newdegate) rejoiced that this discussion had taken place, although he regretted that the House had not had earlier notice of the lucid and most able exposition of this subject given by his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham. He could have wished that it had fallen earlier in the Session, but still he was sincerely glad that at last the attention of the House had been attracted to this subject. The question of the currency had long been so distasteful to hon. Members, that it was little understood; but to him its action seemed simple enough. Our present monetary system effected a compulsory exchange between labour and gold, or its representative, and in this exchange the labourer was injured. To supply the medium of exchange the Bank was obliged to keep a very large amount of gold in its cellars. Now, only a certain quantity of gold for the currency of the country fell to her share by the course of exchange, as abstracted from that amount of bullion, which formed the circulating medium of the world: and if we would have more than our share, we must purchase it by reduction of the price of our produce, that is, of our labour, in order to render our commodities more desirable to foreigners than bullion. And this was a heavy burden upon our labouring classes; for the effect of the Bills of 1816 and 1819 was to impose upon them the heavy charge of maintaining a currency the most expensive in the world, besides the burden, 30 or 40 per cent., added to the value of the national debt and of taxation generally by these measures. The injurious effects of this system upon agricultural interests were as clearly traceable. The Bank, as he had said, was obliged to keep a large amount of bullion; and if the price of bullion rose, the Bank contracted her issues. The consequence was an immediate fall in the price of commodities. The master manufacturers were not slow to shift the loss off their own shoulders—they reduced their men's wages—dissatisfaction, perhaps turbulence, ensued among the workmen—and then the right hon. Baronet came forward and told the agriculturists that it was necessary they should have their prices reduced, to meet the exigencies of the manufacturing classes, as he did in 1842. Thus did the loss and burden ultimately devolve upon the land and its cultivators. He (Mr. Newdegate) was most unwilling to detain the House; but before he concluded, he trusted that hon. Members, particularly those of his own standing, would forgive his expressing a hope, that hon. Gentlemen who came down to the House to legislate upon great commercial questions, involving elaborately the interests of the country generally, and who were in the habit of expressing opinions on these important matters, should not have to avow their ignorance of the state and characteristics of our currency, which formed so important an element in all commercial transactions. Those who proceeded to legislate upon questions so extensive, involving our commercial relations with foreign countries, should surely have some knowledge of that system which depended upon foreign exchanges, and so powerfully affected prices at home. What would be thought of a physician who prescribed for his patient without feeling his pulse, without any knowledge of the state of his circulation, or the action of the heart? Would he not be considered a quack? And were not those Members who were in the habit of legislating for the country in total ignorance of our system of currency, and the state of its circulation, liable to the same imputation? For years, any one who presumed to differ from the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government on this subject, had been considered a lunatic; for years, the right hon. Baronet, by his eloquence, and by his sarcasm, had completely stifled all consideration of this subject. But public attention was gradually turning to this subject, and he (Mr. Newdegate) did hope that hon. Members would no longer submit to be laughed out of the use of their senses. Was it patriotic—was it fair towards the constituencies—was it just towards the labouring and productive classes of this country—that a subject so deeply involving their interests, should virtually be left out of account by the great majority of that House? The action and effects of the currency were so powerful, so universal, that, as had been eloquently observed in the able pamphlet of the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary, "its operation extended from the Queen upon the Throne, to the most abject pauper who exchanges the smallest fraction of our coin for the barest means of subsistence." He had endeavoured to describe the depressing action of our currency, as it affected the productive classes; and if the House, blind to these considerations, determined to expose them to the still further pressure of free trade—determined that our labourers, obliged to maintain the most expensive currency in the world, and compelled to pay taxes in that currency, should also be exposed to the unrestricted competition of comparatively unburthened foreigners, he (Mr. Newdegate) believed that the Legislature would bring about in this country a state of things unparalleled in the history of civilized nations. Now, could it be just to adopt free trade in all things else, and at the same time render the monopoly of money still more exclusive; for the Legislature had created a strict monopoly in favour of money, when by law it fixed the value of our coin. Were not those whose property was in money, measured by a fixed standard—if they gained security from the maintenance of that standard, and the restricted system of our circulation, bound in justice to protect those at whose expense they enjoyed that security? His hon. Friend (Mr. Spooner) had been taunted by the right hon. Baronet with having made no definite proposal. Neither did he (Mr. Newdegate) make any specific proposal for the alteration of the currency. The commencement of a Session would be the proper time for such an undertaking as that; but he was prepared to tell the right hon. Baronet what he would not have done. He would not have introduced the banking measure of 1844, to restrain still further our currency and circulation, already too narrow for the exigencies of the country. He would not, when the population, the realized wealth, the commerce, the exports, the imports, of this country had vastly increased, have still further contracted our circulating medium. He would not, as had been eloquently observed by this very Mr. Alison whose judgment the right hon. Baronet appeared to hold in such contempt, have diminished the quantity of oil supplied for the commercial machinery of this country, when that machinery had been so enormously extended, as it had been, in the last thirty years. He would not, when the supply of meat for an army had been diminished, have provided that the rations of bread also should be so rapidly and extensively curtailed—that is, he would not, when the gold was abstracted by the course of exchange, have provided that the paper circulation of the Bank should be so unsparingly contracted. He (Mr. Newdegate) would conclude by expressing his sincere anxiety that this question should no longer be denied that attention to which, by its importance, it was so justly entitled.

Mr. Muntz said, that as he had not been in the House during the speech of his hon. Colleague, he could only form an opinion of it from the comments he had heard made upon it by the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government; but if it advocated the payment of bank notes at the market prices of bullion, and after such prices should have been materially advanced, then that the notes in circulation should not be payable in bullion at all, he must dissent from such principle and practice. Although he very fully agreed with the speech he had just heard delivered by his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire, (Mr. Newdegate), and could subscribe to nearly the whole of his statements, he doubted the discretion of both his hon. Friends, in introducing a currency debate upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume). In the first place, the two subjects appeared to him to have very little connexion; and in the next place, to debate the money question at a time like the present, when everything appeared bright and smiling, was only giving the right hon. Baronet opposite an opportunity of amusing himself, by ridiculing the views and opinions of all those opposed to him upon the subject, although they possibly might eventually be found more sound than his own. The right hon. Baronet had only done him (Mr. Muntz) justice, when he said, that he had formerly recommended an alteration in the standard of value, upon the ground that a very large proportion of the liabilities incurred under the former depreciated circulation remained unadjusted; but the right hon. Baronet ought to have gone further, and informed the House that he (Mr. Muntz) had recommended that the standard in which the notes shall be redeemed should be a silver standard, like the other countries of Europe, and as this country formerly had; and also that such silver standard should be fixed, so that the relative value of the ounce of silver to the average value of the bushel of wheat, which had long existed, should be maintained; and the price of silver in this country, therefore, should be determined by the average value of the bushel of wheat obtained by the Corn Laws, which were supported by the right hon. Baronet. He could assure the right hon. Baronet that he (Mr. Muntz) was as much at issue with him upon the money question as ever he was; that the question appeared to him as unsettled as ever; that it would again have to be discussed and debated in that House; and that the time would come when the right hon. Baronet would find that he had been mistaken; that the House also would find they had been mistaken; that the country would find it had been mistaken and misled; and that all the three would have most dearly to pay for having been so long ignorant upon this important subject. He would not now say more upon the general question, but would now notice the Motion of his hon. Friend below him (Mr. Hume); and to him it appeared a matter of the first importance that some steps should be taken which should prevent the loss upon light sovereigns from falling upon the poor in the manner it had latterly done, and would do again, if nothing were done to prevent it in future. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had just said that he hoped the circumstance would never occur again; but he had not given the House any reason why it should not do so, and if the different Members of the Government knew as much as he (Mr. Muntz) did of the sufferings of the poor three years ago, he was sure they would see the necessity of taking some steps to prevent a recurrence of the evil. At that time he (Mr. Muntz) was in South Wales, and he could assure the House that for want of preparation on the part of the banks, sovereigns of full weight could not be changed; that he had seen women at Swansea, with children in their arms, unable to obtain the necessaries of life, and crying because they could not change sovereigns of full weight, which they had in their hands. Under these circumstances the unprincipled took advantage of their necessities: and he had known sixpence, a shilling, and even two shillings paid for changing a sovereign to silver. At that time he addressed a letter upon the subject to the right hon. Baronet, and even at this late period he would thank him for the prompt attention which he paid to the subject, and his interference, through the Bank of England. But how did such a state of things agree with the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that every preparation had then been made? Surely there must have been some neglect. Now he (Mr. Muntz), feeling assured that there would be a return of the evil, so long as the country amused itself by the present practice of rubbing gold together, so as to waste it to the tune of many thousands per annum, and periodically to suffer a loss in gross amount of some three to four hundred thousand pounds, as in the last instance, would submit a plan for the consideration of the right hon. Baronet and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which should at least get rid of nineteen-twentieths of the evil. He must, however, guard himself against the supposition that he was one of those who advocated a circulation of 1*l.* notes with the view of elevating prices, and producing permanent prosperity; no one knew better than he did that such a measure must be subject to a speedy re-action, with still lower prices. As, however, the prejudices against 1*l.* notes were on the wane, and the right hon. Baronet had allowed them to be continued in Scotland and Ireland, it might be well to consider how absurd was the present practice in England, of wasting the gold by thousands per annum in abrasion, whilst we might lock it up safely, and as effectually use its representative in paper. Years had now elapsed, nearly twenty years, since 1*l.* notes were first abolished, under the impression that gold could only thereby be retained in the country; but that doctrine had completely exploded, by our having during the period before-named been fully as subject to the exportation of gold as we had been previous to the abolition of the notes. The next objection to 1*l.* notes was, that they encouraged forgery and crime; but this objection must be allowed to have little force, now that they were continued by law in both Scotland and Ireland. He had long been convinced that it was of no importance to the stability of the circulation and the steadiness of prices, whether the notes were 10*l.*, 5*l.*, 1*l.*, or 10*s.*, provided that they were payable in bullion on demand; and also that the amount of bullion held by the Bank bore the same proportion, at all times, to the aggregate amount of all the paper in circulation, which would be effectually produced by the management of the Bank of England under the Bill of the right hon. Baronet in 1844. With these views he (Mr. Muntz) seriously recommended to the consideration of Ministers during the recess, the allowing the circulation by the Bank of England of 1*l.* notes against the gold now in circulation, with a view of preventing its useless and unnecessary waste to the nation, and particularly the loss sustained by the poorer classes. He should certainly give his warmest support to the present Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose, fully believing that the subject was one of great importance, not only in a national point of view, but as bearing unequally and unjustly upon his poorer fellow subjects; and he trusted that even before the end of the present debate, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would propose some means of avoiding the evil in future.

Order of the Day read.

CEYLON.] On the Question, that the Speaker do now leave the Chair,

Mr. Tufnell called the attention of the House to the regulations lately issued, with regard to the compulsory disposal of lands held in the Island of Ceylon, and purchased from the Governor of that Colony by the members of the civil service, and the reflections that have been cast upon their character as public servants in the Governor's minute, dated the 14th day of February, 1845. The circumstances of this case peculiarly called for the attention of the House. It was not surprising, when a former Governor of Ceylon, a few years ago, held out great inducement to the cultivation of coffee in that Colony, that the civil servants were induced to invest their savings in the cultivation of land. This, so far from meeting with the censure of that Governor, met with his warmest approbation, as well as that of succeeding Governors, up to nearly the present time. To such an extent had this been carried, that in 1842, the last year he had returns on the subject, the quantity of land under cultivation for coffee, was not less than 48,500 acres; and by far the greater portion of this was held by the civil servants. Those parties were under contract to hold the land for a certain period; and some of them were prevented disposing of it under the stipulations by which they held it. The Colonial Government, under instructions from home, however, had given orders that they should all part with this land within a limited period, or cease to belong to the civil service in the Colony. He might be told, that by holding land for cultivation they had been guilty of a violation of their oaths; but it should be recollected that the Governor and the highest civil servants of the Colony, had long been in the habit of purchasing and taking land for cultivation. These parties, therefore, were not aware that they were doing wrong in following this example. He considered that the Colony of Ceylon was greatly indebted to the civil servants of the Government there; for they had led the way in the cultivation of coffee, and thus held out inducements to others to go out there and invest their capital in land. In 1838, the value of coffee exported from Ceylon was 116,800*l.*; while the whole value of the exports was 250,000*l.* In 1842, the coffee exported was of the value of 269,762*l.*, being more than the value of all the rest of the exports. It certainly might be wrong on the part of the civil servants to engage in such pursuits, and it might be proper to prevent the practice for the future; but still ample time ought to be allowed them to dispose of this description of property. This was peculiarly necessary with respect to this description of property; for land taken into cultivation for the production of coffee in 1841 and 1842, would only come into bearing this year. Without any previous notice, an order had been issued by the Governor of the Colony to the effect that he had stated; and in which it was directed, that they should either dispose of this description of property within "a reasonable period," or cease to belong to the civil service. Now, he did not object to this, if due time was given; but the Governor insisted that this should all be done within twelve months; and that that period should be stated in the Gazette. The result was, that no one would purchase land, as so much was suddenly brought into the market; and it therefore became depreciated to an alarming extent. He understood, that the Colonial Office had proposed to extend this period to two years; but this was nearly as bad. The following was the notification in the Order:—

"His Lordship has directed, that it be distinctly understood that no civil servant will be permitted to engage in any agricultural or commercial pursuits for the sake of profit; and that all who may have done so must, within a reasonable time, dispose of their property, or retire from the public service; and that this rule be fully and promptly carried into effect; the penalty of any evasion of the boná fide compliance with this rule will be immediate dismissal."

The order further stated, that each of them should communicate within the period of six months to the proper office whether it was his intention to sell his land; and if he did not do so, he was not to remain longer in the civil service of the Government. There could be no difficulty in obtaining information respecting the land, for in the Ceylon Calender published every year, there was a statement as to the grants of land made, of the land sold, and to whom sold. The Colonial Office, therefore, must have been long aware of the civil servants being extensive cultivators of coffee; but it came down and left it to the discretion of the Governor at once to say, whether these parties should all dispose of their land. He feared, however, that the Governor himself, and other high authorities in the Colony, not coming exactly within the narrow meaning of the lower civil servants, were extensive holders of land. He found that in 1840, a grant of land had been made to the Governor of 2,244 acres, to the Secretary of the Colony of 1,371 acres, and to the Archdeacon of 1,970 acres. Here was another injustice with respect to which they had ground of complaint; for when they asked whether the order extended to the clergy who cultivated coffee plantations, they were told it did not. This, therefore, was a great injustice to them; and it was known, also, that the chief colonial jobber in land in the island was the archdeacon. If the order was to be persisted in, he trusted that it would be extended to all persons in authority, and above all to the clergy, and not be confined to the technical term civil servant. The civil servants had sent to the proper authorities the following remonstrance:—

"Those among us who are connected with agricultural pursuits, may now be permitted to solicit your Lordship's serious reconsideration of the order given with respect to the disposal of our landed property. We do not presume for one moment to question the absolute right of Her Majesty's Government, to make it a condition of employment, that a civil servant shall not be engaged in agricultural or commercial pursuits; but we venture to urge upon your Lordship the extreme hardship of compelling those who have already embarked in them, to extricate themselves altogether within so very limited a period. We have now to plead that Her Majesty's Government, in the first instance, encouraged agricultural undertakings by the civil servants; that it has been throughout aware that they were so engaged; and that it has never, until now, intimated any sort of disapproval of their so doing: and that the Governors of the Colony have, in more that one instance, been themselves participators in them. Acting under this encouragement, many of us have entered into arrangements either here, or in England, which we could not at once dissolve without great loss and difficulty. The knowledge by the public that civil servants cannot escape the comparatively immediate and unconditional sale of their property, must, without fail, depreciate the value of their estates to a most ruinous extent. Indeed, we are prepared to prove to your Lordship that such an expectation has already induced parties, before fully intent upon purchasing, to hold back in the hope of very great reductions in the prices. Looking, therefore, to the share which Her Majesty's Government has had in encouraging and allowing civil servants to invest their money in this manner, we hope we shall not be deemed unreasonable in asking for a more extended period to enable us to comply with your Lordships' directions; the limit to which, we would submit, should not be announced to the public."

He did not object to the condition for the future, that the civil servants in Ceylon should not be engaged in agricultural pursuits; but after they had been so long allowed to do so, and after they had been encouraged by former Governors to embark in such pursuits, and of which the Government at home was aware all along, and never interfered by a single objection, it was only common justice that they should have ample time to dispose of their plantations; for a sudden sale must depreciate the value of land to a most ruinous extent, as it induced persons otherwise anxious to purchase to hold back till the expiration of the period. He had been informed that the Colonial Office offered to extend the period from one to two years; but he hoped that the noble Lord the Colonial Secretary would listen to the urgent representations of those parties, and would not object to an extension of the period, and that this limit should not be published. He thought that nothing could be more reasonable than this request, and he trusted that the Secretary of the Colonies would agree to this proposed alteration. He now came to a more serious charge. The former proceeding was an act of injustice, as it involved a sacrifice of property; but this was still more, for it involved an attack upon character. He would refer, on this point, to the minute published by the Governor of the Colony, which contained the accusation to which he referred. The minute was as follows:—

"His Lordship has observed that, in all the accounts which have reached him, he finds a most unhappy unanimity as to the low state of feeling which has of late years crept into the civil service, particularly among the junior members, and it has been in general characterized by want of that zeal, ability, and exclusive devotion to the public interests, without which it is impossible that the public service can be conducted in a manner advantageous to the people or acceptable to the Government."

Supposing these parties to have been deserving of censure, was it just to publish such an accusation in the newspapers and the Gazette? This censure on the civil servants was regarded by them as a most decided and uncalled-for insult. But how was this low state of feeling to be accounted for? The noble Secretary himself, in the subsequent paragraph, said—

"His Lordship is disposed to attribute this unsatisfactory condition of the service principally to the paralysing effect of a constant attention to seniority in promotions, the consequent absence of any hope of advancement by reason of superior merit, and to the smallness of the salaries (in the absence of any provision for pension), which has induced a great proportion of the civil servants to look to agricultural pursuits as a means of improving their income."

If this was the case, all the fault rested with the Colonial Office in allowing such a state of things to exist. He would proceed to refer to the remonstrance of the civil servants, drawn up after this minute of Lord Stanley had been issued. They stated—

"The minutes in question have already been republished by the local newspapers, they have been transferred to the papers of India, will be generally canvassed on the Continent, and can only be productive of a very low opinion of the civil servants here. We beg most respectfully, but most distinctly, to impress upon your Lordship, that at this peculiar juncture in the condition of the Colony, nothing is more essential to its ultimate welfare than that those public servants who really endeavour to do their duty should meet with firm and steady support from the Government. It is impossible for any person not thoroughly conversant with local affairs justly to estimate the increasing difficulties and pressure to which those public servants who hold important and responsible office are subjected. At such a time as this the service had no reason to expect, but laments to find, the Government joining in the imputations that have from time to time been cast upon it. Unmerited abuse from interested and frequently misinformed parties we have hitherto borne with indifference; but how far different is the case, when to that is added the authoritative censure of the Government itself! We have already observed that these documents have been published in the Government Gazette, the ordinary channel through which the local Government communicates official intelligence of a public nature; and thus we find it announced to the world at large, without any previous intimation of such an opinion being entertained, and without any opportunity being afforded us of attempting a justification, that your Lordship considers the civil service of Ceylon, without any exception implied or expressed, lamentably deficient in that proper spirit and feeling which are essential to the reputation and utility of a body of public servants. We much lament that your Lordship should have come to such a conclusion, and we beg most respectfully, but at the same time most firmly, to deny our having deserved such a stigma. Admitting for a moment that there might have been some members of the civil service to whom the censure conveyed by the minute of the 14th of February might be justly applied, will your Lordship only permit us to ask whether, even under such circumstances, it were expedient to give publicity to so universal a condemnation of the whole body of civil servants, and thus to degrade them in the eyes of the community, as well as of the whole world?"

He would say that these terms were fully justified by the document which had called them forth. He could not conceive, until he should hear the defence of the hon. Member (Mr. Hope), what possible justification could be made for the course that had been taken by the Colonial Office in this matter. It was impossible that the officers of the civil service could be more than six weeks absent from their duties without the connivance and sanction of the Government; and he would therefore wish to know what right the Government had afterwards to come forward to censure them? The document went on to say—

"Whatever course expediency might have dictated, we would beg to be allowed to submit to your Lordship whether, as we have no opportunity of defending ourselves, the publication of this censure might not well have been spared us, until, at least, other attempts had been made to work out that reform in the service which the Government required. Even were we to concede the existence of the evils to the extent implied, we might be permitted to refer to the minute itself for the causes of them. The 3rd Clause attributes them distinctly to the injudicious distribution of its patronage by the local Government; and to the parsimonious scale of remuneration allowed to the civil servants by Her Majesty's Government in England. A consciousness of such facts might have induced the Government to pause before pursuing the course it has adopted."

He considered that the noble Lord in sending out that despatch added his own condemnation to it, as the cause which produced it must have arisen solely from the negligence of the Government itself. The first notice which they received of the altered opinion of the Government respecting them, was a public censure on their conduct. He did not know what excuse would be offered for this mode of proceeding; but of this he was certain, that the despatch must have been issued without a due consideration of the consequences that would result from it. It would require a great deal of good management and discretion before the Ceylon civil service could be brought back to its former harmonious and efficient condition.

Mr. G. W. Hope said, it was not his intention to justify the publication of that minute; it was not published by Lord Stanley's directions, and the terms of the minute did not agree with the terms of the despatch, the terms of which were not so general as those of the minute. The Papers would be produced, and it would be at once seen that this was the case. The despatch, indeed, alluded to the reports of the listlessness with which the civil servants discharged their functions, and that they were contented with the bare performance of the duties exacted of them, and of their want of zeal; but it was expressly said that these observations applied to the junior members of the civil service, and not to the whole civil service; and the causes were set out much in the same words as in the minute. Though he was far from pressing hardly against the servants, reports had been received from Sir Colin Campbell and from his predecessors which contained frequent complaints against the junior servants and the way they discharged their duties. It would be difficult to produce those reports; they were given in confidence, and mentioned the names of individuals, which, if given, would increase rather than allay any irritation; but they mentioned individuals and parties going through their services and showing their negligence, especially in the acquisition of the native language. Hon. Gentlemen connected with India would scarcely believe that so many had gone on without having acquired what was an indispensable preliminary to the due discharge of their duties. Therefore, he could not consent to the general denial of the inefficiency of the public service. It was no new charge of the desertion of public duty for the sake of their private property; and since the coffee plantations, there was a great complaint. Coffee planting required constant attention, and the cultivators were subject to the bankrupt laws. The prohibition commenced as early as the year 1813, and the civil officers were required to take an oath not to engage in any trade as principal or partner unless licensed by the Government. In 1834, a question arose as to the cultivation of cinnamon, which was not more of a trade than the cultivation of coffee, and so far from there being a relaxation there was a minute published by the Governor, stating that he had received authority to explain that there would not be in any respect a relaxation of the restrictions against trading. In 1835, the coffee planting began, and in 1836 the former minute was republished. With regard to the purchase of cinnamon, but not with reference to the growing, the complaint was, that remittances could not be made home except in cinnamon, and it was allowed to save Bills; and the prohibition was continued against growing, and had never been relaxed by any Secretary of State from that time to this. Sir R. W. Horton was most distinctly opposed to the practice of allowing coffee growing; and great evils resulted from it. But he need not argue the impolicy, as the hon. Gentleman assented to the propriety of the prohibition, and only objected to the manner in which it was enforced. The manner in which it was done was this:—The despatch was sent in confidence to the Governor, and referred very much to individuals, and it ended with giving a summary to the Governor, not with the view of publication; and he was as much astonished as the hon. Gentleman when he saw the publication of the minute. The main cause of the evil was a very unwise reduction made in 1833 by the Commissioners, who seemed to consider that the whole object was a reduction of expenditure. The abolition of the pension fund, and other causes, materially affected the condition of the service. That cause had, however, been for years in operation, and did not apply to the senior civil servants, who were still entitled to the pension fund, though the juniors were not. The Secretary of State's observations, therefore, were directed to the junior officers only. Upon the whole, it did appear obvious that it was impossible for persons having these private interests fully to discharge their public functions consistently with the engagements into which they had entered on being appointed to their offices.

Viscount Ebrington understood that there was a toll levied on the passage of Coolies from India to Ceylon. Some of the planters had presented a memorial on the subject to the Governor, representing this tax as a most impolitic measure. It besides acted as a great hardship on the Coolies themselves, as these poor people were often reduced to the greatest suffering in their efforts to evade it.

Dr. Bowring said, that every encouragement had been held out by the Government to parties to make purchases of land in Ceylon. There had been no voluntary emigration to that island until it was encouraged by the Government. Considerable sums of money were then invested in land, and when these speculations were entered upon by the civil service there had not been a single word of disapprobation uttered. In fact, the language of the Government all through was the language of encouragement. But, suddenly, these Gentlemen had incurred the displeasure of the Colonial Office, and not only were they divested of their lands, but a sort of opprobrium was attached to them. It appeared that instead of one year, as at first announced, they were now to have two years to dispose of their property; but that would, after all, make very little difference in their case, as they could have no chance of obtaining the full value of it as long as the purchaser knew that the sale was compulsory. The lands might, in a word, be considered as being in the hands of a bailiff, to be sold by a certain time, no matter at what terms. He thought the Government ought to prevent the evil for the time to come, but not to do wrong in correcting that which arose in the time past.

Mr. Aglionby said, he thought the hardship of the case had been aggravated by the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies. These gentlemen ought not to be under the imputation of having broken their oaths, for having merely cultivated their private estates, under the sanction of the Government. He hoped in future, when instructions were sent forth from the Colonial Office, they would be in some way intelligible.

Mr. Hope said, he would be sorry to charge these gentlemen with any intentional departure from their oaths, and he did not think his words would bear that construction.

Mr. C. Buller said, he understood the hon. Gentleman to have quoted the words of the oath as a justification of the course taken by the Government. It was quite clear that a number of gentlemen connected with the civil service in Ceylon had been in the habit of investing money in estates. He would not go the length of saying that no public officer in a Colony like Ceylon should hold land, though he thought that in a new Colony, where the Government possessed all the unsold property, it would open the way to jobbing if they were allowed to make investments in landed property. In an old Colony, however, the case was different, as, if public officers were induced to invest their savings in land, they would acquire an increased interest in the prosperity of the Colony. There was, however, a difficulty in deciding where the line between the two classes should be drawn. But it was clear that in Ceylon all the civil officers had, with the sanction of the Government, been engaged in investing any money they might have in the purchase of land; and he much questioned the justice of the peremptory order which was issued, compelling those men, who were to be regarded as innocent, to sell their property within a given time, and whether that time was fixed at two years or at six months, he thought in either case it was a great hardship to men who for the last ten or twenty years embarked their fortunes in this kind of property with the connivance and countenance of the Government. He had the pleasure of knowing for many years the present Governor of Ceylon — Sir Colin Campbell, and a more amiable and kind-hearted man did not exist, and he was sure he would be quite incapable of using any hardship or severity towards the civil officers of his own accord. The remedy might, he was sure, have been applied without the use of the strong terms that had been applied in this case. The hon. Gentleman seemed inclined to repair the mischief by showing that the application of censure was of a very partial nature. He trusted, however, that a more salutary and judicious plan would be taken for removing the dissatisfaction produced by increasing the salaries of these officers on a fair and equitable system. He would remind the Government that the greatest Governor of any province that England ever had — namely, Lord Cornwallis — on finding a corrupt civil service in India, adopted a conciliatory tone towards them, and his first act was to raise them over all ordinary temptations to corruption, by raising their salaries to sufficient amount.

Mr. Tufnell replied, and remarked that the clergy of the Established Church, and the bishop who had just gone out there, were allowed to purchase property to any extent.

Mr. Hope said, it should be borne in mind that the clergy of the Established Church were not so much under the power of the Government as might be supposed.

Subject dropped.

House went into Committee of Supply pro formâ.

House to sit again on Monday.

Mr. Bouverie moved, that the Report of the Committee on the Death by Accidents Compensation Bill be brought up.

The Attorney General opposed the Motion.

The House divided: — Ayes 7; Noes 39: Majority 32.

Bill accordingly lost.

House adjourned at a quarter to two o'clock.

DECEASED PEERS.] Lord Campbell said, that he should take the opportunity of calling the attention of the House to a subject of one of the Standing Orders, No. 113, with respect to which he had given notice. The Standing Order was to the effect, that any person presuming to publish the works, or life, or will, of any deceased Lord of Parliament, without the consent of the heir or executor of such Lord, should be deemed guilty of a breach of the privileges of that House. He should best discharge his duty on that occasion by referring to the history of the Standing Order. It took its origin from the proceedings of the well-known Edmund Curll—the infamous, the dauntless, the shameless Edmund Curll. In 1720 died John Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, a celebrated poet of that day; and in 1722 Curll published an advertisement in a London paper, called the Daily Journal, in which he announced that he intended to publish a libellous life of the deceased nobleman. In consequence of this, the family of that nobleman interposed, and caused a complaint to be made to that House on the subject. He found this stated in the Journals of the House of the date of the 22nd January, 1721-22, and the advertisement was read, announcing that the Life and Works, in prose and verse, of John Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, together with a true copy of his last will and testament, would be published on a certain day named by Edmund Curll, over against Catherine-street. This person was summoned to the bar of the House, and ordered to attend next day. The Journals for the next day stated that the House being informed that Curll was in attendance, he was called in and examined as to the advertisement, and was ordered to withdraw. The House then came to this Resolution, "That it is resolved by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, that any person presuming to publish the life, or will, of any deceased Peer, without the consent of his heir or executors, was guilty of a breach of the privileges of that House." Curll was then reprimanded by the Lord Chancellor for allowing the advertisement to be printed, and also forbidden to publish the work. In the course of the proceedings upon that occasion, a Committee was appointed; but he could not find that that Committee ever made any Report to the House, though he had made diligent search on the subject. On the 31st of January following, the matter was, however, again taken into consideration, and the Resolution was duly passed as a Standing Order. That was the Order now appearing on their Lordships' Books, and which had remained in force to this hour. He found that the Order was not intended to remain as a dead letter, for an attempt had been made to enforce it in the year 1735. In that year the same Edmund Curll issued another advertisement, which was published in the daily journals, and which gave great alarm to the Members of their Lordships' House. On the 12th day of May, 1735, this advertisement was brought under the notice of the House. It was published in the Daily Post Boy, and was to the effect that there had been just published Mr. Pope's literary correspondence for thirty years, namely, from 1704 to 1734, being a collection of letters written by him to the right hon. the Earl of Halifax, the right hon. the Earl of Burlington, and many others—printed for Edmund Curll, in Rose-street, and sold by all booksellers. It was ordered by the House that the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod should go and seize all the copies of the book, and that the said Edmund Curll, together with John Wilford, by whom the newspaper had been printed, do attend the bar of the House next day. The parties accordingly attended on the following day, and being examined, were ordered to withdraw. The Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod then reported to the House what he had done under their Lordships' order. He stated that he had ordered all the copies of the book found at Mr. Curll's house to be seized, and that he believed they might be 500 in number. A Committee was appointed, to whom the copy of the book presented by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod was referred; and Edmund Curll was ordered to attend the Committee. The Earl Delawarr brought forward the Report of the Committee in the House, and it appeared from it that this was an illegal seizure, that no letters from any deceased Peer was contained in the publication, and that the Committee did not think it contrary to the Standing Order, and they therefore recommended that the books which had been seized, should be restored to Edmund Curll. The Report was read by the clerk attending the House, and agreed to, and the books were given back to the publisher. He was not aware that there had been any other seizure under this Standing Order, though there had been many lives of deceased Peers and of deceased Prelates, Members of their Lordships' House, published on various occasions, without the leave of the friends or representatives of the deceased parties. His noble and learned Friend, who, he regretted to perceive, was not then present (Lord Brougham), had published lives, powerfully and ably written, of several deceased Members of that House, more especially of Lord Chatham and Lord North, and he had no doubt without the consent of the heirs and representatives of those noblemen. He (Lord Campbell) had also employed many laborious hours, without, he hoped, incurring the censure of that House, in writing the lives of the predecessors of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, both spiritual and temporal.

The Lord Chancellor: Not down to the present time, I hope.

Lord Campbell said, he hoped many years would pass before any one could have an opportunity of writing the life of the present Lord Chancellor as a deceased Peer. Curious enough it was, that the Standing Order did not apply to his noble and learned Friend, for any body might take such a liberty with him. The Standing Order did not apply to the life of any except a deceased Peer. In fact, it only followed the rule de mortuis nil nisi bonum. It must, if enforced, serve as an entire prohibition against writing the lives of some Chancellors. For instance, St. Swithin had been Lord Chancellor to King Ethelbert, and St. Thomas A'Becket was also Lord Chancellor of England, and who the heirs or personal representatives of these deceased Members of their Lordship's house might be, he had been unable to discover. Besides, he considered the Standing Order unnecessary, inasmuch as the law allowed an indictment to be laid for a libel reflecting on the memory of a deceased person, and a very remarkable action of that kind was tried in the early part of the reign of George II. He considered this Standing Order one having a strong tendency to bring into disrepute the necessary privileges of their Lordships' House, and he, therefore, begged to move that it be rescinded.

Motion agreed to.

Standing Order, No. 113, vacated.

COMMONS' ENCLOSURE BILL.] On the Motion of Lord Stanley, the House resolved itself into Committee.

On Clause 1 being read,

Lord Portman complained that under the clause, the entire control of the commons to be enclosed would be given to the First Commissioner of Woods and Forests; and when the Drainage Bill passed, the whole landed property of England would be under the control of the Government of the day. He thought, that either the Chairman of the Woods and Forests, or the other unpaid Commissioner, who was not named in the Bill, should be struck out, as he had no doubt but that the latter would also be immediately connected with the Government.

Lord Stanley said, the House of Commons had thought proper to send up the Bill with provision for only one paid Commissioner, and if but one unpaid Commissioner were appointed in addition, the two Commissioners would not be able to work as satisfactorily, in case of differences among themselves, as a Board consisting of three Members. These Commissioners would not have so much power as the noble Lord supposed. All they had to do was, in the event of a certain number of persons interested in the enclosure, making an application to them for the purpose, first to make inquiry, and they were then empowered to frame a scheme or draft bill of the enclosure. That scheme was to be referred to the parties interested in the inquiry, and unless these assented to the proposal of the Commissioners, then the whole matter fell to the ground. Even if the parties did assent, the subject should then come before Parliament. The main object of the Bill was to save expense, and he thought, under the circumstances, that some one of the Commissioners ought to be a responsible Minister, who would be answerable to Parliament for what was done.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses, up to Clause 11, agreed to.

On Clause 12 being read,

Lord Stanley moved the omission from the clause of the words—

"That no royal forest, or any part thereof, shall be deemed common land under the provisions of this Bill,"

For the purpose of inserting the words—

"No part of the New Forest, in Hampshire, or of the Forest of Dean, shall, &c."

He proposed the alteration, because he understood there were forest lands in some parts of Wales that might be advantageously brought under the provisions of the Bill.

The clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 13, 14, 16, 17, and 18, agreed to.

Clause 15 postponed.

Clause 19 was agreed to, after some discussion between Lord Stanley, Lord Portman, Lord Cottenham, Lord Lyndhurst, and Lord Camoys, as to the mode in which the interests of infants were to be represented in cases of enclosure.

Clauses 20 and 21 agreed to.

Clause 22 was postponed at the instance of Lord Campbell, as it was founded upon the supposition that the existing law had been violated.

The other clauses agreed to, with a few verbal Amendments.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL.] The Duke of Buccleuch, in moving that the House do now resolve itself into Committee, adverted to the Report of the Commissioners of Inquiry on this subject, detailing the present state of the law and its administration. It was well known that the present provision for the relief of the poor in Scotland was very inadequate; an inadequacy not arising from any want of charitable disposition among the people, but from the defects of the machinery created for carrying out the law. In providing for the more effectual relief of the poor, it was not intended to alter the principle of the present law; the Bill was framed in accordance with the evidence taken before the Commissioners, and he believed was regarded with general favour in Scotland.

Lord Campbell allowed that there was in the Bill much that was good; but still thought it might be made better; he would, therefore, suggest that it should stand over, so that it might be improved during the recess. He admitted that the state of the Poor Law in Scotland was most objectionable, and, above all, that part of the law with reference to pauper and criminal lunatics. That most important portion of the Bill having reference to the medical relief of the poor, he greatly approved of. He was satisfied that it was for the interest of the poorer classes that there should not be too lavish a measure of relief for the destitute poor, for by so doing, a strong stimulus to exertion was removed. There were some persons who thought that every ill affecting humanity could be removed by the Legislature; but this was merely chimerical. To offer inducements to a young man and young woman, without any means, to marry at an early period of life, and to bring into the world as many children as their fecundity would furnish, was a principle which was most objectionable, and to which he never could give his assent. These early marriages had been productive of one of the evils under which Ireland suffered, and any checks to so great an evil must prove salutary. There were some of the clauses of the Bill which he was satisfied would give rise to considerable litigation, and would cause an enormous expenditure. Those parts of the measure having reference to the Law of Settlement were also open to objection. Some parts of the Bill, also, would fall rather heavily on English persons taking up a temporary residence in Scotland. Voluntary assessment formerly existed to a considerable extent in many parts of Scotland; but they might depend upon it, under the operation of this Bill, that they would be got rid of altogether. It might be held that all property liable to the Property Tax ought to be made liable to this tax also; but at present they had no rule whatever. The noble Duke was wrong in supposing that this Bill would not alter the existing law, as there were to be three new modes of assessment introduced under it, and there would be agitation and disunion produced in every parish in Scotland, in fixing on which particular mode they should select. One of the most gross instances of injustice which the Bill would inflict, would be in cases where Englishmen had a temporary residence in Scotland. In every such case, all the property which the individual possessed in any part of the world would be liable to assessment in the parish in which he resided. He trusted, therefore, that the Government would introduce some provision to guard against this injustice. Having stated these objections, he would not, for the present, detain their Lordships with any additional remarks. His principal objection was to the clauses regarding assessment. They were calculated to produce infinite litigation, and unless they were altered, it would, he thought, be much better to withdraw the Bill altogether, and to wait for another year before legislating on the subject. If persevered in as it at present stood, he had no difficulty in foretelling that the Bill would be hereafter called the curse of Scotland.

House in Committee.

Lord Campbell said, he had some Amendments to suggest as to the Assessment Clauses, and also respecting South Leith. which he would bring forward on the bringing up of the Report.

The Earl of Haddington wished to observe, in reference to what had fallen from the noble and learned Lord who had just sat down, that the principle of assessment to which he objected was the principle of the old law, and was also admitted in various local Acts. It had been tried for a long period, and he never heard of its having created any of the litigation or difficulty which the noble and learned Lord seemed to apprehend. He could not understand why any Scotchman who, as was sometimes the case, made a large fortune in England, should not be taxed when he returned to reside in his native country. Besides, he believed it did not happen that means and substance were rated in England.

Lord Campbell said, the noble Earl had entirely misunderstood him. He by no means objected to the principle of means and substance being taxed, as he believed it to be perfectly just and proper; but what he wanted was, that there should be a definition of the term given in the Bill.

The Lord Chancellor said, he did not understand the Bill to introduce any new principle in the law. The courts of Scotland would decide on the construction of the term means and substance, in accordance with their usual mode of proceeding; and if that was not thought sufficient, he should wish to hear the noble and learned Lord himself try his hand at a definition.

The Earl of Dalhousie said, the law existed in Scotland for 300 years, and, to his own knowledge, was constantly acted upon.

Bill reported without Amendment.

House adjourned.

Somerville, and Mr. Wawn, from Guardians of Dunshaughlin Union, and Inhabitants of Kinsale, for Alteration of Poor Relief (Ireland) Act.—By Mr. Spooner, from a great number of places, for Alteration of Law relating to Promiscuous Intercourse.—By Mr. Blackburne, from Nantwich, for Diminishing the Number of Public Houses.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

REMOVAL OF PAUPERS.] The Report on the Removal of Paupers Bill was brought up. On the question that it be agreed to,

Mr. Sharman Crawford complained that the Bill would cause a great deal of misery by separating families. He would mention one instance, that of a labouring man, who, after leaving Newtownards, had resided thirty-three years at Whitehaven, and having become chargeable to the parish, he was immediately sent off to Newtownards, regardless of his prayers and entreaties to be permitted to remain at Whitehaven, where some of his children had gained settlements. This separation had so great an effect upon the unhappy man's mind, that he had hanged himself.

Sir J. Graham said, that the Bill was intended chiefly to relieve Scotch and Irish paupers from many of the evils to which they had hitherto been exposed. In respect to the case mentioned by the hon. Member for Rochdale, he believed that the head of a family could not be removed in the way mentioned against his will, and if he were thus improperly removed, the party so offending would be subject to a severe penalty.

Report agreed to. Bill to be read a third time.

Games and Wagers.] House in Committee on the Games and Wagers Bill.

Clauses up to 16 were agreed to.

On Clause 17, Wagers not recoverable at law being proposed,

Mr. C. Berkeley objected to the proviso to the clause, that it was not to apply to subscriptions for a plate or prize, because it was legislating for one side only, and because it would, he contended, legalize gambling one way, while it attempted to put a stop to it on the other.

Sir J. Graham thought the proviso essential to the clause. It only legalized mere subscriptions.

The Committee divided on the Question, that the proviso stand part of the clause: —Ayes 37: Noes 3; Majority 34.

County Magistrates.] In answer to a question from Mr. Henley,

Sir James Graham said, that although cases might occur in which a magistrate might act singly in a judicial capacity, yet it would be a sound discretion to make such cases rather the exception than the rule; and where a penalty was to be levied, he thought it would be well to do so in the presence of other magistrates and the clerk, where it was possible. When cases occurred in which a delay would defeat the ends of justice, then it would often be necessary for a magistrate to act singly.

Mr. Henley wished to be informed whether or not it was the intention of the right hon. Baronet to bring in a measure next Session relative to those cases where a magistrate was called on to act singly in a judicial capacity.

Sir J. Graham was not prepared to introduce any such measure.

In answer to Mr. Hume,

Sir J. Graham said, he had no intention of introducing a measure to relieve the county magistrates from those duties. On the whole, he thought that they were most useful to the country from the manner in which they discharged their duties.

Hours of Business.] Mr. Brotherton wished to suggest to the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir R. Peel) that it would be better that, for the remainder of the Session, the House should meet at twelve o'clock, and continue its sitting until the business on the Paper for the day was finished, instead of adjourning for an hour or two, as at present, between the morning and evening sittings.

Sir R. Peel thought that it was objectionable to make any departure from the custom of the House in the transaction of business, especially at so late a period of the Session, without the general concurrence of the House. His own opinion was in favour of the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman, and if that suggestion met with general concurrence on the part of the House, he had no objection to it whatever. If, therefore, the House concurred in the suggestion, he had no objection to propose that, after to-morrow, the House should meet for the despatch of business at twelve o'clock, and sit continuously, instead of adjourning after the morning sitting.

Educational Institutions.] On the Motion that the Order of the Day for going into Committee of Supply be read,

Mr. Ewart said, that when the Military, the Naval, and the Ordnance Estimates were brought before the House, a statement was made of the prospects and condition of those branches of the public service respectively; and he did not see why, in like manner, there should not be an annual statement of the condition and prospects of the Educational Institutions which were supported partly or wholly by the public funds. What he called for was not a published Report, but a vivâ voce statement on this important subject. The publication of a blue book was not the most effectual way of bringing this matter before the House and the country, and he thought that the Annual Report, prepared by Commissioners and Inspectors appointed to go the round of the country, furnished a convenient mode not of developing, but of concealing such a question. Amongst other improvements which he thought were called for in connexion with the subject of education, was that of raising the condition of the schoolmasters of the country, and of increasing their pay. He trusted that this important improvement would be speedily realized. There was also a necessity for increasing the number and the efficiency of the training schools of the country, as a greater number of training masters than were at present to be had were required. As to the grant appropriated for the purpose of education, he thought that 75,000*l.* was but a paltry grant for the supply of the educational wants of such a country as this. In Scotland, as well as in England, the pay of the schoolmaster was very inadequate. In both countries he was anxious to see the condition of the schoolmasters much improved. Connected with this question was the important consideration, as to Scotland, of the improvement of the condition of the schoolmasters belonging to the Free Church. He gave credit to the Government for their new system of education in Ireland, and did not apprehend that the fears of those who thought that that system would make the Irish an irreligious people would be at all realized. In reference to education, he thought that the Government could only interfere collaterally and not directly. So much for the first portion of the Motion of which he had given notice. Another portion of that Motion referred to public libraries, a subject to which he had, on former occasions, called the attention of the House. On one occasion, on which he had alluded to it, he was answered by the right hon. Baronet that there were libraries of a public nature already established in England, such as those connected with mechanics' institutes in our large manufacturing towns. But there was only one library in this country, of which he was aware, that could be compared with the libraries which were so numerous on the Continent. In France, in Italy, in Germany, and in other continental countries, not only in the large, but in many of the smaller towns, there were public libraries accessible to all classes, and to the foreigner as well as the native. If the Government of this country would only assist in promoting the establishment of such libraries in all our large towns, they would confer upon the public a great and a lasting boon. He did not ask the Government to originate them, he only asked them to assist in their establishment. There was another point which he deemed of great importance, which was, that Government should promote, as far as it could, the encouragement of education, by the examination of those persons who were candidates for subordinate offices under Government. This might be regarded by some as a very visionary proposal, and as a thing which could not be carried into effect. But he had been told by Members of the late Government that the experiment had been tried, Lord Melbourne having set aside three clerkships of the Treasury for that purpose, and that it had been successful. He thought such educational appointments would work well, and that the public servants thus selected would be found efficient and well qualified for their duties. It was simply his desire, in the present instance, to call the attention of the Government and of the House to this consideration, which he thought a very important one. Every point of the Motion which he was about to lay before the House had reference to the mode in which Government might promote, without unduly interfering with, the question of education. Undue interference in this matter he deprecated. Undue interference the people of this country would not tolerate. Upon this whole subject he felt so strongly, that he considered himself bound to take the sense of the House, if necessary, upon it. The hon. Gentleman concluded by laying the following Resolutions on the Table, and moving the first—

"1. That a statement be made, on the part of the Government, of the condition and prospect of such Educational Establishments as are supported wholly or partially by a vote of this House.

"2. That it is expedient that the formation of Public Libraries, freely open to the public, be encouraged.

"3. That it is expedient that Schools for the training of Masters be more extensively promoted.

"4. That it is expedient that appointments to the subordinate offices of Government be made (as far as possible) by examination of the merits of the candidates for such offices."

Sir R. Peel said: However late the period of the Session, and however severe the pressure of public business, I cannot but think the importance of the subject justifies the hon. Gentleman in calling the attention of the House to the question of education. I shall very briefly notice the particular points to which the hon. Gentleman has referred, taking in order the Resolutions of which he has given notice. The House will have laboured under erroneous impressions if they supposed that there was not full information afforded with regard to the progress of education. I need not refer to the volume presented annually to the House as a reason why any oral statement should not be made to the House on the part of the Government, with regard to the progress of education during the preceding year. But for the purpose of indicating to those Members who take an interest in the question, I may say that there are annually presented to Parliament the Reports of the inspectors appointed by a Committee of this House, which Reports contain the most detailed and valuable information on the subject of education. There is the volume presented in the course of the present year, containing the able and full reports of the several Inspectors of Education. But I am not at all prepared to contend against the principle suggested by the hon. Gentleman. It is possible that because the information is so full and vague that Members may not readily acquire that knowledge of the subject which possibly they might obtain from an oral statement made by a Member of the Government. I am therefore disposed, on the part of the Government, to give my serious consideration during the recess to the proposition of the hon. Member. I think I can undertake to say, that during the course of the next Session this Vote will not be moved on the part of the Crown without such an explanation being made as shall answer the purpose of the hon. Member. I think it possible that such a statement may awaken public attention more forcibly to the subject, than the presentation of this volume, and will better enable Members to discuss the matter, and bring their local information to bear upon it. At any rate it will be a proof that the Government and Parliament attach due importance to the subject. I think I have said enough to show the hon. Gentleman that it will not be necessary for him to ask on this occasion for any expression of opinion on the part of the House. With reference to the grant for educational purposes, the hon. Gentleman says he deeply regrets the limited amount. The amount, however, has been an increase upon the grant of last year. The amount last year was 40,000*l.* The amount in the present year is 75,000*l.* Therefore, in the present year, as compared with the past, we have proposed a vote nearly double. For education in Ireland we have also voted 75,000*l.*; so that we have proposed to vote for educational purposes in England and Ireland, in the present year, no less a sum than 150,000*l.* That is a strong indication of the wish of the Government to apply the public money, so far as they can, to the purposes of education. I advise the hon. Gentleman, therefore, to leave this matter in the hands of the Government, and to rest satisfied that they will next year, if necessary, make an increased grant to further the object to which he has called attention. I entirely agree with him in what he says as to the status of the schoolmaster. I think his position ought to be regarded as honourable; and, by attaching importance and value to his labours, we shall be amply repaid. The hon. Gentleman has also referred to the necessity of increased grants for the normal schools in which the schoolmasters are prepared for their labours. He will find that, within the last two years, the Vote for that specific purpose has been increased—at least, that there has been an application for an increased sum for that purpose. Some years since the sum of 10,000*l.* was granted for the normal schools of the British and Foreign School Society. In addition to that the sum of 10,000*l.* was granted for the establishment of the schools of the Committee of Council. Within the last two years an annual grant of 1,000*l.* was given to the National Society, and 750*l.* was given to the British and Foreign Schools for their annual maintenance. There was also a grant of 3,700*l* made for the building and establishment of the Chester Diocesan Training School; and a grant of 3,200*l*, towards the Training School in Lancashire; 3,500*l.* was also given towards the building and establishment of the York Diocesan Normal School. In Scotland, towards the building and establishment of the Edinburgh Normal School, 4,000*l.* was granted; and 5,000*l.* towards the establishment of the Normal School in Glasgow. I think these Votes a sufficient proof that the Government have not undervalued the importance of the subject introduced by the hon. Gentleman.

The supply of masters, properly qualified, is at the root of the whole system; and I quite agree with the hon. Gentleman, that you cannot more effectually promote education—local education—than by making a proper provision for the masters. The Committee of Council feel that one of the most important objects to which their attention has been directed, is the increase of the means of providing masters properly qualified, and of good character, for the education of youth. Within a recent period, we have extended the objects for which the annual grant is made. In England, in 1840, a sum of money was granted for the erection of 211 schools. In the year ending August, 1843, a sum was granted for the erection of 251 schools; but in the year ending August, 1844, funds were supplied for the purpose of building not less than 380 schools. Then we have made another addition to the object for which the Vote was given. We have consented to give Votes towards the construction of schoolmasters' houses; because we think it of great importance that the master should reside in the neighbourhood of the schools; and, by providing the masters with a comfortable residence, you hold out an increased inducement to persons of competent attainments to undertake the important task of education. As I said before, in addition to the objects to which the Vote was applied, we found it necessary to propose an increase to the Vote, to the amount of 35,000*l.* I am bound, at the same time, to admit that I doubt whether that increase ought to be the limit of future grants. So great is the desire of persons interested in the welfare of the working classes to increase the means of instruction, that I much doubt whether the application of an increased sum in the course of next year would not be fully justified by the circumstances of the case. I think, after what I have stated, that it will be hardly necessary for the hon. Gentleman to call for any expression of the sense of the House. The last Resolution moved by the hon. Gentleman, and the last topic to which he adverted, was the policy of making the appointment to the subordinate offices of Government depend, as far as possible, on an examination of the merits of the candidates for such offices. I doubt whether the system at present adopted in the different departments of Government is not better. In almost all cases, the appointment is for the first year as a probationer. The individual is appointed with the distinct understanding, that if his conduct and attainments do not justify the permanent retention of his services, he is liable to lose his situation. The appointment of a person to the public service should not entirely depend on the exhibition he may make on examination; there are points connected with the moral character that ought to be taken into the account. The mere exhibition of superiority in an examination must be necessarily imperfect; and if you were to rely on it, you would find that you were not securing in all cases a supply of trustworthy persons. I admit there ought to be evidence of sufficient attainment to justify an appointment; but I doubt whether that rule of giving a trial for the first year is not, on the whole, a better mode of securing faithful, trustworthy, public servants, than making their eligibility depend on such an exhibition. As to extending Government patronage to boys educated in those schools, there would be great difficulty in acting practically on that suggestion. The youths leave school at fourteen or fifteen, and were not eligible for public employment till twenty-one. During that interval their time would not be very usefully employed, if led to rely on an appointment at the end of six years. A similar encouragement held out to the schoolmaster would tend to interfere with a sufficient supply of schoolmasters. The hon. Gentleman himself will see the difficulty of practically carrying that suggestion into effect; besides, such appointments would have the effect of discouraging those who were unsuccessful. Under these circumstances, I hope I have met the proposition of the hon. Member in the spirit in which it deserves to be met. I hope the hon. Gentleman will allow the question to be put from the Chair without calling for a division.

Mr. Wyse said, he was about to second the Motion of his hon. Friend; but the observations of the right hon. Baronet had gone far to remove the motives which might have induced his hon. Friend to press this question to a division. The right hon. Baronet had omitted in his statement any allusion to what the hon. Member (Mr. Ewart) had said respecting libraries. The observations of the hon. Member on that head were most important, and highly deserving of the attention of the Government. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, of giving a more comfortable house to the master, and a more comfortable school to the pupils, was deserving of the greatest praise. He hoped that the right hon. Baronet would go further, and allow a small portion of land in the agricultural districts to the teacher, so as to enable him to command more comfort. This would be peculiarly applicable in the case of Ireland, and more so than in the case of England, as land would be more easily procured for such purpose. He wished to call the attention of the right hon. Baronet to the means that might be taken to improve the condition of teachers, in Ireland particularly. It was proposed, that the National Board of Education in Ireland should be incorporated, so as to enable them to take lands for the purposes to which he (Mr. Wyse) had adverted. He thought that great improvement might be made in the normal schools, upon the understanding that a certain system of education should be adopted in those schools which would be satisfactory. He thought that, under such an arrangement, an increased sum of money might be given for the improvement and enlargement of those schools. He rejoiced at the statement which had been made by the right hon. Baronet, and which he had reason to think from his observation of the conduct pursued by the right hon. Baronet on this question on former occasions, he was sure —that those observations were not made lightly, but that they would be followed, as they had heretofore been, by deeds and measures. He hoped that, after the observations that had been made by the right hon. Baronet—a declaration which was most satisfactory—that his hon. Friend (Mr. Ewart) would be induced to withdraw his Motion.

Mr. Hume expressed the pleasure which he felt at the declaration of the right hon. Baronet on the subject of education. He was glad to find that a subject of such great importance had been brought forward by his hon. Friend. He was happy to hear, from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, that the cause of education, and the education of the people at large, engaged the best attention of the Government. He was glad to find that the desire of the Government was that all classes should be educated without exclusion. He was glad to see, in the increased grant for education, an increased desire on the part of the Government to promote the education of all classes without exclusion. He was glad to see that their interest in the cause of education had induced them to increase the grant for education in England and Ireland. He hoped that if this grant should be found insufficient for its object, that the grant would be increased, and that some report would be laid before the House of the application of the former grant, the various points of expenditure, and the mode in which the money was disposed of. He was glad to see that the Committee of the Privy Council had increased their exertions in assisting schools with school materials, such as maps. He thought this a matter of great importance. He believed that no people were more ignorant of the extent, the various circumstances, and statistics of the British possessions, than the British people generally were. Now in Prussia this was not the case. Every school in Prussia was furnished with an atlas, containing an exposition of the extent and relations of the Prussian dominions; and to which was appended a various and extensive amount of statistical facts with respect to the population, revenue, extent of territory, and various other circumstances appertaining to Prussia, so that every boy in those schools in Prussia was made acquainted with the leading facts connected with the geographical and statistical state and relations of Prussia. He thought that this was a subject worthy of consideration, and means ought to be taken to diffuse a similar knowledge with respect to Great Britain, through the means of those schools, to the boys educated in them. He hoped that if the right hon. Baronet should find the grant of 75,000*l.* insufficient, that he would recommend a larger grant. He concluded by expressing his satisfaction at what had been stated by the right hon. Baronet, and he thought that after that declaration his hon. Friend could not do better than to leave the matter in the hands of the Government.

Mr. Hawes was glad that the Motion of his hon. Friend had been brought forward, as it had elicited the important declaration of the right hon. Baronet. No grant which the Government could propose would meet with more cordial satisfaction from that House, than an increased grant for the purposes of education. In saying this, he could not but consider the grant of 75,000*l.* as inadequate for the great purposes to which it was intended to be applied. The education now afforded in our public schools was very imperfect. Private teachers were necessary in addition to the school instruction. This increased the expenses, which were so great as to put it out of the power of the middle classes to avail themselves of them. He thought something like the collegiate system which they had lately established in Ireland might be introduced into this country with great advantage. It was necessary, also, to improve the position of teachers, and to induce men of talent and ability, by holding out to them sufficient advantages, to continue to devote themselves to the instruction of youth. With this view, he would suggest that a fixed annual sum should be allowed, in the shape of a pension, say from 50*l.* to 100*l.* each, to such schoolmasters as had distinguished themselves by great talent and long service in the instruction of youth.

Amendment negatived.

SCHOOL OF DESIGN.] On the Question that the Speaker do now leave the Chair,

Mr. W. Williams said, if the right hon. Baronet would consent to the appointment of the Committee for which he had given notice of his intention to move, he would not detain the House with a single observation.

Sir R. Peel believed his hon. Friend would be able to show that there was no ground whatever for the allegations in the petition upon which the hon. Member had founded his case for a Committee. If so, and considering that it would be most objectionable to do any thing that might tend to encourage insubordination in the school, he must refuse his assent to the Motion.

Mr. W. Williams would then proceed to call the attention of the House to the circumstances under which he brought forward the Motion. He believed he was in a condition to prove that great mismanagement existed in regard to this institution. That it had proved a complete failure for the objects for which it was instituted was proved by the Report of the Committee which had been just presented to the House. The Committee say—

"It is to be regretted that manufacturers are not more generally disposed to meet the views of such candidates for their service, and to afford them such facilities and liberal encouragement as would serve to secure, for the purposes of ornamental manufactures, much available talent, which, in default of such encouragement, is often withdrawn from the further study of ornament, and directed exclusively to the pursuit of fine art."

But the very next paragraph contradicted this, and showed that the school had excited the highest expectations amongst the manufacturers, for it stated—

"In the course of the last year, numerous applications have been received for the execution of designs in various departments of ornamental art, and every endeavour has been made to comply with these requests, as far as the execution of such commissions has been consistent with, and could be made to form a part of, the prescribed exercises and course of study in the school. Designs for different purposes have thus been furnished to manufacturers in London, and in several provincial towns, and from time to time manufacturers and others have purchased of students various designs which have been produced in the performance of the exercises of the school. In the number of such commissions, and in the extent to which the productions of the students are applied to commercial purposes, a constant increase is evident; and the numerous communications which come before the Council at each monthly meeting of the committee on correspondence, as well as the frequent visits and inquiries of persons connected with ornamental manufactures, may be noticed in proof of increasing relations between the school and those commercial parties whose interests this institution was especially designed to promote."

The failure of the school was attributed as he believed, to the constitution of its managing body. The whole management was confided to twenty-four gentlemen, who were called the Council of the School; and when was there an instance of any institution having a governing body of this nature, consisting of twenty-four persons, being successful? Some time after the commencement of the school, Mr. Dyce, a distinguished artist and very talented man, was appointed to conduct it, and he performed that duty with great ability and perfect satisfaction to all parties. He was, however, removed, in consequence of some dispute with the directors. A Mr. Wilson was then appointed director, a gentleman unlike Mr. Dyce, for he was neither artist nor workman. Subsequently, a gentleman most distinguished for his talent, an associate Royal Academician, and one of the most rising men of the day, Mr. Herbert, was appointed to teach the school. That gentleman, believing that the school was capable of producing great national advantages, undertook for a salary, which could be of no object to him, the duties of master. The great ability of Mr. Herbert was admitted by the Council themselves in their Report; he was, however, dismissed. And he understood that on the occasion of that gentleman's dismissal, four only of the twenty-four members of the Council were present. No doubt there were many highly talented men amongst the members of the Council; but the great misfortune was that they seldom or never attended. One great difficulty in carrying out the objects of such an institution as the School of Design was the getting together a class of talented young men advanced in the arts. That difficulty had, in this case, been got over, and a class was formed, consisting of thirty-nine young men efficient as artists, that efficiency being proved by the fact, that five of the prizes given in 1843 were obtained by members of this class; and last year the same class carried away thirteen of the highest out of twenty prizes. The young men composing this senior class wrote a letter to the Council, complaining that the director was not capable of affording them the instruction they required; and the Council for this, without any inquiry, ordered their expulsion. The right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) said they should not encourage a rebellious spirit amongst the pupils; and no doubt he thought that the thirty-seven scholars who had made these representations to the Council were mere boys, or the sons of poor men. They were neither. There were amongst them the sons of gentlemen as respectable as many of those he was now addressing; and instead of being mere boys, they were for the most part men between twenty-one and thirty years of age, many of whom had evinced considerable talent. The Council had since offered to permit the return of those young men upon terms contained in a letter drawn up by this very Mr. Wilson, in language as offensive as could well be imagined. They were required to make a special application to the director, acknowledging the impropriety of their previous conduct, and expressing their intention to conform themselves in every respect, for the future, to all the regulations of the school, as laid down by the directors. This might be a proper way to treat boys of fourteen or fifteen years of age; but it was not the way to treat men who had left the school not from any rebellious spirit, but because they found they were wasting their time there for want of sufficient means of instruction. These pupils had offered to Mr. Herbert, their former master, the same salary he had been allowed at the school, namely, 100*l.* a year, if he would undertake their instruction, devoting only one-half of the time to that duty which he had been required to give at the school; but that gentleman refused, for he could make five times as much by applying the same time to his profession. In consequence of the young men who gained the prizes last year being expelled, there was now nobody in the school to compete for them. And here he must say that the Council had acted with less fairness than he expected, in declining to mention in their Report the names of those students who gained prizes last year, and were afterwards expelled. He was informed that the exhibition this year exhibited a miserable lack of talent, and the prizes were chiefly obtained by persons who could not be said to belong to the school —certainly by persons who had not been educated therein. One person, who had gained two prizes, had been seven years a designer in some of the manufacturing districts of Scotland, and had obtained a respectable living there by his talents as a designer. Another person, who had gained three prizes, had only been three months at the school, having been educated elsewhere. Two or three other old designers had obtained prizes. Let the House look at the falling-off in the number of pupils this year, as compared with the last. In April, 1844, the number of pupils attending the evening classes was 196; in July it was 189, showing a falling-off of seven. This year, the number in April was 186, and in July, as he was told, it was only 111, being a falling off of seventy-five. This was to be attributed to the proceedings of the Council in expelling thirty-seven of the most advanced and most able young men in the school. What was the present state of the school? Mr. Pugin, one of the most able men in this or any other country, stated that there were but two Englishmen of any talent in his service as decorators in the Gothic department, and these were two of the pupils who had been expelled from the School of Design. In a letter which Mr. Pugin had made public, he gave it as his opinion that there was no hope of seeing any real good effected by the School of Design, as at at present managed; though under a different system it might have been made the means of creating a school of national artists. Should his Motion for a Committee be not granted, he would entreat, for the sake of the public good, that, at all events, the right hon. Gentleman would dismiss the Council, and, instead of having twenty-four members, assemble a smaller body who would attend. He attached great importance to the subject. Owing so much as he did to manufactures, he felt the greatest possible interest in their advancement in every way. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that—

"A Select Committee be appointed, to inquire into the allegations contained in the Petition of the Senior Students of the School of Design in Somerset House, and into the general management and present state of that School."

Sir G. Clerk was unable, upon the part of the Government, to comply with the proposition of the hon. Member, as he thought that nothing could be more calculated to destroy the prospect of public benefit arising from the School of Design, than for the House to accede to the prayer of a small number of students for a Committee of Inquiry into their allegations. The hon. Member's complaints seemed to resolve themselves into two classes, the one founded upon gross partiality alleged to have been shown to Mr. Wilson, the other on gross injustice alleged to have been perpetrated towards Mr. Herbert. Mr. Wilson was chosen by the directors to succeed to Mr. Dyce, upon that gentleman's withdrawal from the establishment. He was an artist of very high talent, and one for whose works considerable prices had been given by the best judges. Besides his qualifications as an artist, Mr. Wilson was a man of fine taste and extensive knowledge of the history of the fine arts. Now, the duties of director of the School of Design were different from those of a mere teacher of painting. He did not wish to say a word in disparagement of Mr. Herbert; but he was employed in the school merely to teach drawing from the figure—not a primary or principal object of the School of Design, but one of an entirely subsidiary nature. Mr. Herbert was not a teacher of ornamental design; but unfortunately, because the pursuit of drawing from the figure was one more likely to be attractive to young men of artistic talent, than the mechanical work of designing patterns, there was a tendency on the part of many of the young persons frequenting the School of Design, to go there with the view rather of studying in order to become artists, than mere designers of patterns for manufactures. To this fact, might be traced the late unfortunate disturbances in the school. By far the larger numbers of the alleged "senior students" were under nineteen years of age; four of them were only fifteen, another four were only sixteen, and only five or six were above the age of twenty. An unfortunate difference, in which the petitioners had taken part, had arisen between Mr. Herbert and Mr. Wilson, the former having applied disparaging epithets to the latter, for which there could be no justification. According to the rules of the school, notices had been affixed to the doors of the class rooms, stating that certain students had incurred punishments for inattention. One of them had been attached to the door of Mr. Herbert's class room, and he and his pupils took up the matter as a personal insult. An unseemly altercation took place in the class room, Mr. Herbert appealing to the students against the character of Mr. Wilson. It was then found necessary, in order to preserve discipline, to suspend the class. Let them examine some of the statements of the students implicated; and then let them say whether such representations, coming from boys, many of them under fifteen years of age, to the effect that Mr. Wilson was incapable of giving them instruction, could be for a moment entertained by the House. The grievances of the students had been put into a printed shape, under the title of their "depositions." Now, among the students, there was one person, twenty-nine years of age, named Hearn; and in order to show the animus by which these lads were inspired, he would direct attention to some of his statements. This gentleman then stated, that Mr. Wilson took him into his private room to show him some of his (Mr. Wilson's) original drawings; and that on being left to copy one of these, he discovered in a corner of the canvass the name of an Italian artist. The inference was obvious. Now, the fact was this, Mr. Wilson had given this young man to copy some characteristic drawings of his own early Italian architecture, upon which he had written in the corner the name of the place at which the several drawings were made, and which this learned critic mistook—never having heard of the town of Orvieto—for the name of some great unknown and unappreciated Italian artist. After this specimen of the talents and acquirements of the leader of the dissatisfied students, he put it to the House whether, on the ground of such complaints, the hon. Member had made out his case for inquiry? However, if the hon. Member was right in his statement that the School of Design was making no progress, that would be an important point in his favour. He hoped that he would go to the exhibition now open at Somerset-house, and perhaps he would there see what would make him change his opinion. That exhibition was one of the best which had yet been opened to the public, and it had been got up without any particular ostentation or straining after effect. But the best proof of the excellence of the patterns consisted in the fact that no sooner were they exhibited than the greater number were purchased at high prices by eminent manufacturers. There was a test of the progress which the school had made. He believed, too, that applications had been made by various manufacturers to the Council to recommend them to young men as designers in various branches of industrial production. Many persons, too, who had formerly received their patterns from France, found it unnecessary now to do so, as they were enabled to get patterns here drawn with just as much skill and taste as any received from abroad. Another proof of the success of the school would be found in the progressive increase of the students. Considering, indeed, the shortness of the time during which the school had been founded, it was surprising how so much had been effected by it; and although these students had complained of Mr. Wilson not being able to impart instruction to them, yet that gentleman had received the most flattering testimonials from those who were really the senior students of the school, thanking him for the instruction and information which he had communicated to them, both as regarded the history and the style of art in all ages and all countries. Under these circumstances, looking to the progress which the school had made, to the satisfactory nature of the present exhibition, knowing that the situation of Mr. Herbert had been filled up by an artist of quite as great reputation; knowing all this, and being of opinion that the recent attack on Mr. Wilson had been dictated by a bad heart, he trusted that he had said enough to show the House the propriety of refusing the Committee moved for by the hon. Member.

Mr. Ewart thought the time of the House ought not to be taken up by mere personal disputes; but on that portion of the question which was not personal a Member was justified in making a few remarks. What was the aspect of the case before them? Did the hon. Baronet deny that the school was disorganized? Thirty-seven of the senior pupils had seceded; he called the school disorganized, for it was thus torn and rent asunder. Mr. Herbert, the master, had left; the complaints were general; the manufacturers complained that they could not get good designs; Mr. Pugin, one of the most eminent judges of art in the country, declared the state of the school to be highly unsatisfactory, and said he was obliged to seek out artists to work his ornaments on the Continent. Had they not a right then to ask for inquiry? For what purpose was the school originally established? It was established by Lord Sydenham, in consequence of the Report of a Committee of which the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Hawes) and other hon. Gentlemen were Members. He was asked by Lord Sydenham to be a member of the Council, but, disapproving of the constitution of the school, he refused; the school, he believed, would have gone on well had it been properly conducted, and he believed it would hereafter produce excellent effects. But the hon. Baronet (Sir G. Clerk) seemed to consider that the object of the school was to make workmen, not artists. That was the fatal error; in that consisted the error of the whole system. A school of design ought to rest upon two things—the study of the human figure, and copying from nature. This was the course of study pursued by the most eminent artists, like Raffaelle, or those who had wrought practically in the art of ornament, like Benvenuto Cellini. The great school of Napoleon at Lyons was based on the study of the figure; and the school at Somerset-house would attain greater eminence, if the same course of study were adopted. In Paris, in the Ecole Royale de Dessein and the Ecole Communale, study from nature and life was rigidly enforced. In the school at Manchester the study of the figure was introduced under Mr. Bell; a dispute arose with Lord Sydenham on the subject; the study was discontinued, and to that might be attributed the decline of the school. As to the constitution of the school at Somerset-house, he agreed with the hon. Member for Coventry that it was doubtful whether its government should be intrusted to a board. He had no faith in the divided government that existed under boards, and he believed the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary would incline to the same opinion. He would rather see some one person responsible to that House. In a council of many members there would be sure to be parties, or, the greater number absenting themselves from idleness, the real authority fell into the hands of five or six. He had no wish to use such a word as "job:" but in this case things had a tendency to become such in the hands of a junta. He thought there ought to be an inquiry, and if the hon. Member divided, he should support him.

Mr. Wakley had hoped that one of the Council would have offered his opinion to the House, and was surprised the hon. Member for Lambeth had not done so. No answer had been given to the statement of the hon. Member for Coventry; the hon. Baronet (Sir G. Clerk) had undertaken the task, but the hon. Baronet must feel he had not discharged it to his own satisfaction. He could scarcely have weighed the case duly when he told the House it was a trumpery one. The public money was asked for to be expended on the school, and it was alleged to be in a state of disorganization; he was also informed, by persons fully competent to judge, that it was conferring little or no benefit on the community. Was this state of things to last? The Committee was asked for at a late period of the Session, and it was almost impossible then to go into an inquiry; but, would the Government grant a Committee at the commencement of the next Session? Were the allegations made by the students to be passed over unregarded? Where was their insubordination, or allegations of misconduct on their part? Was any charge ever made against them till they complained to the Council? For making that complaint they were expelled the establishment, and all their expectations and prospects blasted. Was the institution made for the masters or the students? The Report made by the Council to the House of Commons passed over the differences in silence; only the slightest reference was made to them in a portion of one paragraph. There was not a word about the dismission of Mr. Herbert; the Report was an attempt to deceive and practise a delusion on the House. The facts most material to the utility of the establishment were entirely concealed. Mr. Herbert's dismissal was an insult to that gentleman, and an injustice to the students; a gentleman of higher attainments and capability could not be found in the country—he was universally respected in the school, and was dismissed on account of a difference with the director. He thought there ought to be a fair inquiry. He understood, out of the twenty-four members of the Council, only four were present when Mr. Herbert was dismissed; and, besides this, he had heard that when a reconciliation was talked of between Mr. Herbert and the director, one of the four said, they must put a stop to this! The students merely complained of Mr. Wilson's incompetency, and he thought they would not have risked such a complaint without cause. The Council never inquired into the justice of their complaint, but dismissed them at once: was it to go forth to all the schools in the country, that the students must not complain of their masters, under pain of dismissal? The constitution of the school was generally defective. It was governed by a sort of piebald board; and with such a board it was perfectly impossible that the school would ever be well governed, neither would it ever be well conducted, while the favoured director was continued in an office to which he was incompetent. His incompetency laid the foundation of the insubordination of the pupils, and the influence of intellect, as a controlling power, was necessarily lost, or at least weakened.

Mr. Hawes said, the hon. Member for Coventry had received most incorrect information on this subject. He had also made use of language as regarded the Council of which they had a just right to complain. The conduct of the Council by no means laid them open to the charge of jobbing, or of being a clique, or of having "cooked up" their Report. The Council laid their Report upon the Table of the House, but they had not dared even to allude to the fact that they had dismissed Mr. Herbert, nor would the House have been aware of the fact had it not been for the Motion of his hon. Friend. He said it was not dealing fairly with the House. He trusted that the right hon. Baronet would take the whole case into his serious attention before the next Session; because, in regard to the fine arts and the position of the working classes in respect of them, there could be no more important question. He understood that from Manchester alone upwards of 20,000*l.* was sent abroad for designs. It was true that the Report did not allude to the dismissal of Mr. Herbert, and he thought the Council would not have well discharged their duty to the public, had they filled it with a detailed account of the unfortunate squabbling which had broken out in the school. The Council deeply regretted the fact; but Mr. Wilson and Mr. Herbert could not agree—the Council failed in effecting a reconciliation between them; and as both gentlemen could not remain in the school, the Council, after deep and very anxious consideration, determined that it would be for the interests of the school that Mr. Wilson should remain director; consequently Mr. Herbert was compelled to retire. Mr. Wilson was well known to be an eminent artist. He had been sent abroad to report on works of ancient art; he made his Report, which was laid on the Table of that House, and it was one which had never been surpassed. The hon. Member passed a high eulogium on the talents and fitness of Mr. Wilson for his situation as director, and observed that that gentleman had furnished a Report on ancient art which was confessedly the best that had been made, and which had been considered sufficiently good to be printed by order of that House. The hon. Member for Coventry said the school had declined; but the amount of fees received in each year showed that it had gone on progressively. In 1838, the fees received amounted to 183*l.*; in 1839, to 167*l.*; in 1840, to 103*l.*; in 1841, to 133*l.*; in 1842, to 164*l.* in 1843, to 238*l.*; and in 1844, to 326*l.* The increase in the number of students was, of course, in the same proportion. The manufacturers regarded this school with so much interest, that they applied for and received several of the students as apprentices to ornamental work. There was not one of the directors that would not be glad to see any alteration made that could promote the interest of the school; but when inquiry was sought on the ground that they were a set of jobbers, he (Mr. Hawes) would not consent to an inquiry on such terms.

Mr. Wyse could also bear testimony to the fulness and fairness of the inquiry instituted by the Council into what he must designate as this unfortunate quarrel. He should feel it his duty to oppose the Motion as it then stood.

Mr. Hume would advise his hon. Friend not to press his Motion. The fact of the dismissal of a man of so much talent as Mr. Herbert, indicated that there was something wrong in the present system. There must be in the Report, he thought, a suppression of some important facts, and he trusted that Her Majesty's Government would consent to lay additional information on the Table, in order to enable the House to form a correct judgment.

Amendment negatived.

Police (Ireland).] Viscount Clements moved—

"The consideration of the petitions of John Connif, E. Kirwan, Robert Clegg, and Joseph Boyd, formerly in the Irish police; and further, to recommend some change being made in the regulations of that body."

The noble Lord complained of the system of quartering whole families on the public, by putting them into the police force, and also of the mode in which the pensions and superannuation fund were managed. The stipendiary magistrates received the largest sums as superannuation allowances in proportion to what they paid to the latter fund, whilst the privates who paid most, received the least. He thought it was altogether improper to mix up the magistracy and the police, and he could not understand the principle on which the superannuation allowances to the magistrates were regulated. The Government had been much abused for the appointment of Major Priestly as Deputy Inspector of Police; but he (Lord Clements) was happy to compliment them on that step, which he believed to be a wise one.

Sir T. Fremantle said, the charge was not of such a serious nature as to need a minute defence, and therefore, he should not enter on the question at any length. He reminded the noble Lord that it was the practice of the army for superior officers to try inferior, and it was sanctioned in the police by Act of Parliament. It was creditable to the management of Colonel M'Gregor, that the noble Lord could bring no stronger charges against the police than those he had made on this occasion. He (Sir T. Fremantle) regretted the dismissal of some of these persons, because he knew that three of them were men of good character; but with respect to Boyd's case, that individual had stated, that he had applied to Lord Clements, because he understood that he could procure him a pension. Boyd, however, had had the full gratuity allowed by law previously, and so likewise had the others in question. The noble Lord had complained, that the sons of officers were appointed to situations in the constabulary; but he (Sir T. Fremantle) thought that was a fact for which the Government should be praised rather than blamed, as they thus rewarded old and deserving men, who had served their country. With respect to the non-receipt of rewards for the apprehension of offenders, it arose from the great difficulty in determining the right claimant. The noble Lord had referred to the evidence of Colonel M'Gregor; but he was bound to say, that Colonel M'Gregor had the confidence of his superiors, and that he eminently deserved it. In regard to the military character of the police in Ireland, he should be very glad that they could go about without arms; but the state of the country rendered it impossible. Under these circumstances he could not agree to the Motion.

Mr. Sheil wished to ask a question respecting the distribution of the patronage over this force. Under the late Government, Colonel M'Gregor had appointed, he believed, two in three of the vacancies in the chief constables.

Sir T. Fremantle: No, one in three.

Mr. Sheil wished to ask what was the course now pursued, and whether the recommendation of Colonel M'Gregor was not considered almost conclusive?

Sir T. Fremantle said, that no change had been made by the present Government with reference to those appointments. All the inferior posts were placed at Colonel M'Gregor's disposal, and of the superior officers two out of three belonged to the Lord Lieutenant, and a great many were given to the sons of officers. The third belonged to Colonel M'Gregor, to promote such officers as he considered entitled to promotion.

Motion negatived.

House in Committee.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.] The first Question was, that the sum of 3,410*l.*, be granted to defray the charges of the Civil Establishment of the Bahama Islands.

Mr. C. Buller wished to make some observations on this Vote. The population of the Bahamas was 25,000, and the local revenue was 21,943*l.* He thought, that with such a revenue they ought not to come to this country for any more. The great principle of these Colonies ought to be that they should cut their coat according to their cloth. He found in these Votes 5,670*l.* for judicial officers. Then there was an income of 3,227*l.* for clergymen. Could these Colonies provide nothing for clergymen? He did not mean to divide the House; but he hoped that next Session these Estimates would be brought forward at a better time, and that those who objected to these charges on this country would take the opportunity of recording their sentiments on the subject.

Vote agreed to.

On the Question that a sum of 4,049*l.* be granted for the Civil Establishment of the Bermudas,

Mr. C. Buller said, that this was on a different footing, as the Bermudas were a penal settlement, but considering that the population was only 10,000, and the revenue 15,000*l.*, and that this year there was a surplus of 1,907*l.*, they ought not to come and ask of this country a sum of 4,049*l.*

Mr. G. W. Hope said, that the Bermudas were a great military station, in consequence of their being a penal settlement, and that increased the charge. This relief had always been given to the Colony, for though in some years there was a surplus, in others there was a deficiency.

Vote agreed to.

On the Question that the sum of 3,070*l.* be granted, to defray the charges of the Civil Establishment at Prince Edward's Island,

Mr. C. Buller said, that this was about the worst case he knew. The population of this Colony was nearly 50,000; the revenue was 10,500*l.*; the island possessed a very rich soil, and an admirable climate, and yet we were charged with this additional Estimate. He did not object to the payment by this country of the salary of the Lieutenant Governor, for he thought the most prudent course would be to defray from the public funds of this country the salaries of Colonial Governors and of their secretaries. But he could not conceive why the Colony should not pay the salaries of its chief justice, attorney general, and other officers. He would not now divide the House on this Vote; but he wished to state, that it was his intention, during the next Session of Parliament, to do more than merely call the attention of the House to these subjects.

Vote agreed to.

On the Question that the sum of 12,000*l.* be granted to defray the charge for the Civil Establishment at St. Helena, and for pensions and allowances to Officers of the East India Company's late establishment in that Island,

Mr. Williams said, he thought this Vote excessive in amount. There were in St. Helena forty officers paid by the people of this country, to govern a population of 4,800 persons; and the collection of a revenue of 15,000*l.* in that island cost 2,593*l.*, or about 17½ per cent. During the war this island was of great importance to the East India Company, and he thought that Company ought to pay the salaries and allowances of their retired officers.

Vote agreed to.

On the Question that 7,219*l.* be granted to defray the Expenses of the Settlement of Western Australia,

Mr. C. Buller said, the population of this Colony consisted of 3,476 persons, and these unhappy people were taxed, for local purposes, to the amount of 9,070*l.*, or nearly 3*l.* a head. He wished to know how that money was spent?

Mr. G. W. Hope said, if the hon. and learned Gentleman had given notice of the question, he would have been prepared to answer it. There were numerous charges for colonial chaplains, colonial surgeons, and other purposes which were not included in the present estimate.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, a considerable sum had been expended in this Colony in the erection of public buildings.

Vote agreed to.

On the Question that a sum of 3,171*l.* be granted to defray the Expenses incurred at South Australia,

Mr. Hindley said, the Government had made an agreement with purchasers of land in this Colony, by which the money paid for land was to be applied to the promotion of emigration. A very extravagant outlay had been made by one of the Governors on public buildings; the late Government had refused to honour his bills; and a sum of 56,000*l.* had been appropriated from the funds acquired by the sale of land to defray this outlay, instead of its being applied to the extension of emigration. He wished to know whether the Government intended to apply the sum which had thus been taken from the fund to purposes of emigration?

Mr. G. W. Hope said, the agreement was that the fund derived from the sale of land should be liable, in the first instance, to meet any expenses necessary for the purposes of the Government; and that, if it was not so required, it should be applied to promote emigration. It was, undoubtedly, the intention of the Government to apply as large a proportion as possible of the money received for the sale of land to the promotion of emigration to South Australia.

Vote agreed to.

On the Question that the sum of 329*l.* be granted in aid of the charge of the Settlement at Port Essington,

Mr. C. Buller asked whether there was any truth in the report, that it was the intention of the Government to establish convict Colonies in the northern part of New Holland?

Mr. G. W. Hope said, there was no intention of establishing such a settlement at or near Port Essington. He could not say that such an establishment might not be formed in the north of New Holland, but nothing had yet been determined on the subject.

Vote agreed to.

On the Question that the sum of 11,353*l.* be granted for Expenses of the Ecclesiastical Establishment of the British North American Provinces to the 31st of May, 1846,

Mr. W. Williams objected to the Vote. He thought that the proposed amount was too much; besides this, he thought that the principle of paying the clergy by votes of this kind was most objectionable, especially in a Colony like Canada. He wished to know what had become of the proceeds of the hundreds of thousands of acres that had been reserved for the clergy, and which had been actually sold to defray some of the expenses of the Colony. Why, he wished to ask, had not the produce of those sales been applied to the payment of the clergy? He would divide the Committee upon the Vote.

Dr. Bowring objected to the difference between the amount of salary paid to the Protestant and Roman Catholic bishops of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

Mr. Sheil objected to the distinctions made between the salaries paid to the Roman Catholic and the Protestant bishops in the Colonies. In Newfoundland, for instance, the salary of the Roman Catholic bishop was only 75*l.* a year, whilst the salary of the Protestant bishop in the same locality was so large as to afford a remarkable contrast. He thought that distinctions of this kind ought not to be so remarkably kept up in a Colony inhabited by a Roman Catholic population.

Mr. Hope said, that the sum paid to the Roman Catholic bishops in Canada was the subject of agreement with the Government, and must be continued during their lives.

Mr. Sheil said, that he only wished to call the attention of the House to the disparity between the payment to the Roman Catholic clergy and to the Protestant clergy. He thought that a distinction of this kind ought not to be made.

Viscount Sandon observed, that the Protestant bishop of Newfoundland got nothing at all; and before they proposed any increase to the amount paid to the Roman Catholic bishop, they ought to be sure that he would receive it, seeing how much opposed the Roman Catholic hierarchy of Ireland were to any connexion with or payment by the State.

Mr. C. Buller said, that the Roman Catholic Church in Canada was richly endowed. The Catholic clergy in Canada were well provided for, and most comfortably situated. The Established Church was also well provided for. However, without wishing to deprive those establishments of their endowments, he should vote with the hon. Member for Coventry.

Mr. G. W. Hope said, that the whole of these charges were for the lives of the individuals only.

Mr. C. Buller observed, that if so, if they were merely annuities payable to certain individuals, he would not oppose the Vote.

Viscount Sandon said, it would be an extremely improvident act to dispose of the clergy revenues at present, as suggested by the hon. Member for Coventry, inasmuch as they were of but little value. Let them first train the inhabitants of those provinces to habits of industry and civilization, by which means those lands might be rendered much more valuable; and then, if they pleased, dispose of them. But it would be a miserable and mistaken economy to do so at present.

Mr. Sheil observed, that with regard to Lower Canada, there were no episcopal estates there. As yet, too, the Legislative Assembly of Lower Canada was undisturbed by religious dissensions, and he thought it would be very bad policy to introduce such dissension for the sake of so small a sum.

Dr. Bowring opposed the Vote.

Mr. Collett wished to ask, whether on the decease of the present Colonial bishops the charge would still be continued?

Mr. G. W. Hope said, that the impression was that those charges would cease; but that impression depended only upon statements made in Parliament.

Mr. Williams observed, that the same assertion had been made in 1845, and yet that the Vote remained the same.

Mr. Hope said, that the Vote had been diminished.

The Committee divided.—Ayes 60: Noes 18; Majority 42.

Vote agreed to.

On the Question that the sum of 18,895*l.* be granted for the Indian Department in Canada,

Mr. Hindley objected to it, on the ground that the amount necessary for that department should be procured on the voluntary system.

Mr. C. Buller said, that his impression was, that if that sum were to be paid by the people of this country, the best thing that could be done with it would be to throw it into the sea at once, for he believed that money never was more scandalously applied. When he held office in Canada, he caused inquiries to be made into the management of these Indian settlements, and he found that there were not three real Indians in the whole of them, in Lower Canada. The people were a kind of half-caste, and were as dissolute, worthless, and idle a population as were to be found anywhere on the face of the globe. The largest item in the Vote was one of 14,157*l.* for Indian presents, stores, &c., and he was aware that some importance was attached to those presents; but he was sure any one who was acquainted with the circumstances in which they were made would agree with him that they did a great deal more mischief than good. The Governor went up into the settlement, and he took care to give to the inhabitants nothing but what should be really useful, such as clothing, agricultural implements, and so on; but the fact was, that traders always went up also at the same time with the Governor, carrying with them brandy and tobacco, and articles of that description. The inhabitants, directly they received their presents from the Governor, exchanged them with the traders for the tobacco and brandy; and the consequence was, that the whole settlement invariably became the scene of the most licentious debauchery for the next fortnight or three weeks. He contended that there should be some inquiry as to the sums voted away for purposes of this nature. Upon such a subject no one could better advise the Government than Lord Metcalfe; and he hoped that before next year a report would be obtained from that noble Lord as to the utility of those presents.

Mr. G. W. Hope said, that the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman had been anticipated. Inquiries were going forward, and he hoped, before next Session, information on the subject would be in the hands of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. W. Williams thought that those presents were completely thrown away. Many of the Indians were better off than our agricultural labourers at home.

Vote agreed to.

On the Question that 48,800*l.* be granted for defraying the expenses of Stipendiary Justices in our West India Colonies,

Mr. Hawes said, they were nearly useless. In his opinion, an annual report ought to be made, setting forth the nature and extent of the services which they performed.

Mr. G. W. Hope said a few words in support of the Vote, the purport of which it was impossible to catch in the gallery.

Mr. W. Williams said, that he so decidedly disapproved of the Vote, that he should divide the Committee on it.

The Committee divided.—Ayes 61: Noes 10; Majority 51.

On the Question that the sum of 80,000*l.* be granted for the Expenses of the Establishment at Hong Kong, and the British Ports in China.

Mr. Hawes said, he thought this was an immense sum to commence with at these establishments.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the expenses of living were very high at these places, and that in consequence of their reported insalubrity it had been found necessary to give increased salaries to induce persons to accept offices there.

Vote agreed to.

Chairman then reported progress. House resumed. Committee to sit again.

PHYSIC AND SURGERY BILL] On the Order of the Day for going into Committee on the Physic and Surgery Bill,

Sir J. Graham rose to state the alterations he proposed to make in this Bill. It was his intention to move that the House should go into Committee pro formâ, in order that his proposed Amendments might be printed, and it was his intention to proceed with the measure in the next Session of Parliament. The right hon. Baronet went on to state that it was his intention to adhere to his proposal to incorporate the general practitioners, and that in England there should, in all cases, be two examinations before the parties should be admitted as general practitioners. He also adhered to the provision which made the age at which the examination should commence twenty-two years. But, instead of the examination before a joint board of physicians and surgeons, he proposed that the first examination should be by a board of general practitioners, and that subsequently there should be an examination before a joint board of surgeons and physicians. Those who passed both examinations were then to be registered as general practitioners, and to become members of the College of Surgeons. He further proposed that the fees for examination by the Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons should be raised, so as to pay the examiners properly, and provide for the museum and library, &c. of the College of Surgeons, to which the candidates would belong, viz. 5*l*. 5*s*. for the College of Physicians, 5*l*. 5*s*. for the College of Surgeons, and 10*l*. 10*s*. for the museum, library, and general expenses. He proposed also that the examinations in Scotland and Ireland by the Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons should be kept distinct, in order to equalize the number of examinations for the license of the general practitioner in the three kingdoms. On removing from one kingdom to another, all classes of practitioners to be admitted members of the corresponding College in the kingdom to which they so remove, without further examination, but on payment of the same fees as if they had been originally examined and admitted members of that College. Army and naval surgeons and those intended to practise in the Colonies need be examined only by the Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons (besides the army and naval medical boards in the case of army and naval men); but he did not propose that they should thereby acquire the right of practising in England within five years, unless they had also passed the College of General Practitioners. Those who were now practising in England with Scotch or Irish diplomas as general practitioners, to be admitted to register as general practitioners without examination. He further proposed that the clauses relating to Universities should be struck out, and no restriction imposed either as to the time of residence necessary for granting degrees, or the assumption of the titles of graduation. With respect to the nomination of the members of the Council of Health, he proposed that the number should be reduced from nineteen to, at the highest, thirteen, including the Secretary of State; and that the Crown should have the right of nomination. Application had been made to him to advise the Crown to grant a supplementary charter to the College of Surgeons. That matter was now before the Crown, and arrangements had been made which, he believed, would induce him to advise Her Majesty to grant the supplementary charter.

Bill went through Committee pro formâ.

Mr. Wakley very much feared that the changes proposed by the right hon. Gentleman would not be satisfactory. The right hon. Gentleman had certainly taken great pains in reference to the subject, and the public were indebted to him for the services rendered them on this question; but, instead of simplifying his plan by the proposals he had now made, he (Mr. Wakley) was afraid that the additional number of examinations—the double examinations as to Scotland and Ireland—would not be satisfactory. The profession, however, would have an opportunity of considering the question during the recess, and he hoped that all parties would concur in bringing about a satisfactory conclusion to this very important, but extremely difficult question.

Bill as amended to be printed.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. From General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, and from Haddington, and from Lochwinnoch, against the Poor Law (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill.

IRISH GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY BILL.] The Earl of Besborough said, that he thought that no noble Lord who had read the Report, could doubt that fraud had been perpetrated in making out the lists of subscribers to the Railway. It was not intended in the Report to bring a charge of this kind against the directors; but that it had occurred through their negligence. The House was aware that, in undertakings of this kind, it was customary to put in the list of the provisional committee the names of persons of influence, and more especially those connected with other railways; but if persons suffered their names to be thus used, they should take care to see that the proceedings were properly carried on. The noble Earl then proceeded to read extracts from the evidence taken before the Committee appointed to inquire into the allegations of Mr. Pym's petition with respect to the allotments of shares, with the view of showing that the statements in that petition had been proved. He thought that the statement of his noble Friend (the Marquess of Clanricarde), that the first part of the Report had not been proved by the evidence, could not be sustained. He, therefore, was satisfied, in consequence of the utter want of adherence to the Standing Orders of that House by the promoters of this Bill, that they could not allow it to proceed. It could not also be said, that the second Report did not sustain the allegations in the first. Under these circumstances, he felt it to be his duty to move that the Bill be taken into further consideration this day three months.

The Marquess of Clanricarde could not understand the reason that induced his noble Friend to fix on this particular Railway Bill with such energy, with a view of preventing the further progress of it. He did not see why this Bill should be stamped with a character of fraud, when many other Railway Bills, against which the same charge could be sustained, as to the names of unqualified persons being affixed to the contract deed, had been allowed to pass without any observation. His complaint against the Report of the Committee was, that it brought the charge of systematic fraud having been used for the purpose of obtaining the requisite number of signatures. Now, had his noble Friend said one word, or quoted a single portion of evidence, to show that any man had been induced against his will to sign the contract deed to which his name was affixed, or that greater frauds had been perpetrated by persons getting shares without reference and inquiry, than was the case with other railways? When a specific charge of fraud was brought against any one, the Committee should show that there was good evidence to sustain such an accusation; but there was no evidence to justify such a charge. He denied the whole of the allegations contained in the Report of the Committee. The whole of the proceedings with respect to the appointment of the first Committee, were irregular. That Committee was named to inquire into the allegations contained in the petition of a Mr. Pym, a stockbroker in Dublin, who was largely interested in the success of atmospheric railways; and who was also a large canal proprietor, and, like other canal proprietors, was opposed to this Bill, under the notion that it might be injurious to his interests. So it might be immediately, but would not ultimately; and some of those people had seen their mistake, and withdrawn their opposition to railways; but then Mr. Pym was a shareholder in another railway, and he (the Marquess of Clanricarde) was glad that the House had inquired into the allegations of Mr. Pym; but he contended that their Lordships ought not to pounce upon an unfortunate Bill, which had been actually victimized by fraudulent persons, and a company which could not protect itself against those fraudulent parties. Their Lordships ought to attack the system, not individuals. He trusted that next year there would be some material alteration in the system of railway government—the present system was most unsatisfactory. He knew that the House was most unwilling to act against the Report of a Select Committee; but the proceedings of the Committee on this Bill were altogether different from those on any other that he recollected. The House should remember that Mr. Pym went before the Standing Orders' Committee; but his evidence was not received, because it appeared that he had no locus standi, as he was not a proprietor in the line, or had any other interest in connexion or in competition with it. This person, then presented a petition to that House, which was most irregularly referred to a Select Committee, which certainly was against the Standing Orders. He conceived that it would be a most unjust proceeding, if they did not allow this Bill to pass. He did not deny that some frauds had been committed, but he strongly denied that the directors and promoters of the Bill were in any way a party to them. [The Earl of Besborough: The Report.] The Report did not directly make such a charge; but it stated that some persons had got a certain number of signatures improperly affixed to the contract deed. Was it not notorious, that there was no description of ingenuity which was not resorted to for the purpose of obtaining shares, as such large profit was often derived from speculating in them? It was known, also, that the stockbrokers had now lists of persons, called black lists, who were constantly engaged in the traffic of shares, and many of these persons had imposed on persons engaged in promoting English and Scotch railways, who were much better able to protect themselves from such proceedings than the promoters of an Irish railway; and all this arose from the imperfect state of the law. The noble Marquess then proceeded to read a list of the names of persons who had imposed upon the directors of this Company, and who had been referred to in the Report of the Committee, and showed that those persons were subscribers for shares in several English and Scotch Railway Companies to a much larger amount, than was the case with respect to the Dublin and Galway Railway. By referring to The Times newspaper, in which the advertisement for this Company first appeared, it would be found that out of twenty-four advertisements of railway companies published in it, only four required any reference at all; and in the Times of the 6th or 7th of November last—he did not then recollect which was the date—there were no less than fifty railway advertisements, all inviting the public to take shares, and of these only ten required any reference to be given. Thus the Dublin and Galway Railway Bill was now to be thrown out because they did that which had been done by four-fifths of all the railways in England, Scotland, and Ireland, when they were really in the market. But he would come to what had been described as the model of a railway, and of a board of directors, namely, the London and York, and to that model of a witness, Mr. Moatt. When that gentleman had been asked whether they had had any applications from men of straw, such as stable-boys and men of that class, he replied that they had not above twenty applications in which they had been imposed upon. If, therefore, that Company, which was so much cried up, had been imposed upon in twenty cases, how could it be expected that a number of Irishmen forced to resort to the London share-market should be more successful? That reminded him of another argument. The evidence of this witness showed that even great English companies did not disdain to give allotments of shares at first without inquiry, and that it was only when they got a position in the market that they took the precaution to have men of undoubted credit selected as their shareholders. In fact, it was quite necessary at the commencement of such undertakings that more than ordinary risk should be incurred. The witness stated that it was found to be always the case that when capital was coming in, it begot other capital from subscribers of greater respectability. It was a notorious fact that in the case of the Greenwich Railway, which now, he believed, carried as many passengers as any railway in England, that fully half of the capital, when the Bill passed through Parliament, was utterly bad, but that these shares afterwards fell into good hands. And in another railway, also—the Gloucester and Bristol Railway—which now conferred great benefits on the part of the country through which it passed, upwards of one-third of the subscription list, as it originally stood, was found to be bad, though the shares of this company were now selling, or had been selling two days ago, at 30 per cent. premium. He could not, therefore, see why they were to make an example of the Dublin and Galway Company, whilst others had been allowed to pass. It was quite possible for parties to get up fraudulent cases, for the purpose of extorting money from the directors. For instance, four persons, A, B, C, and D, might sign the subscription list for each other, and then if they found the speculation not to answer their wishes, they could go to the directors, and, under threats of exposing their own dishonesty, extort money from them. In this way, he could account for the petition of the person, or rather the name of Gerard Barry. No such man could be found, and though the name was one that sounded familiarly enough, it could not be discovered that this person had ever existed. The entire amount required to be subscribed in this Company, under the Standing Orders, was 810,000*l.*, while the amount really subscribed was 819,000*l.*, of which 67,200*l.* was found to be bad. But then by the alteration which had been proposed in the original plan, a saving of twenty miles would be effected, in consequence of the Galway line joining the Cashel line at Portarlington. A sum amounting in the entire to 228,000*l.* would, from this and other circumstances, be available over and above what was necessary to complete the line, independent of which the Great Southern and Western Railway Company now offered to subscribe 100,000*l.* additional capital if the Bill were now passed. The noble Marquess proceeded to refer to the evidence of Mr. Mulvany, the engineer, and of General Sir John Burgoyne, chairman of the Board of Works in Ireland, given before the Committee, to show the great importance of this line of railway, and then continued to say that he would humbly submit to the House that this Bill should be allowed to pass on the ground of its great utility to the country —on the ground that its rejection could effect no public good—on the ground that by throwing out the Bill they could do right to no person who had been wronged —that they could not remedy any imperfections in their law—and that they could do nothing except put a stop to one of the most important works that could be undertaken in Ireland, and that, too, at a most critical period in the affairs of that country. The present Session had not been either a very short or a very unimportant one, and yet he would put it fairly to the House what had they done for Ireland? They had certainly made an attempt to improve the social, political, and religious feelings of the country, by passing certain bills for the promotion of education, but they had effected nothing farther. They had old reports from Committees appointed over and over again to inquire into the state of Ireland, and to these they had now to add the report of the Commission over which his noble Friend (the Earl of Devon) had presided. All these reports described again and again the misery and wretchedness of the people, and the necessity of procuring employment for them, if the Legislature wished to alter their condition. But the Parliament had done nothing. They had made no additional grant for public works in Ireland—they had made no provision for improving the Poor Law, or for providing for emigration, or in any other way for benefiting the country; and yet now when a number of great capitalists came forward and offered to execute this great public work, which would give employment to the poor, develop the resources of the country, and add to its improvement in every possible way, and when all they required was permission to lay out their money, the House was about putting an entire stop to this most beneficial undertaking, solely on the ground that the directors had been deceived by fraudulent persons in London. It was not unlikely that such men as General Caulfield (and a more honourable, respectable, and venerable officer could not be named) would be unable to detect such parties, when men like Sir I. Goldsmid and Mr. Hudson had been deceived by them. He (the Marquess of Clanricarde) could not believe that the House would thus stop this Bill; it ought, he conceived, to be re-committed.

Earl Bathurst, as chairman of the Committee on the Bill, wished to state that they had not felt themselves the less bound to report the frauds they found, because such practices might have existed elsewhere. In fact, the Committee had given no opinion on the Bill, nor was the House placed under the necessity, therefore, of sustaining any finding of theirs. The Committee had only reported that certain frauds had been committed; and they had left it to the House to decide whether those frauds so vitiated the Bill that it ought not to be passed.

The Earl of Wicklow said, he was extremely sorry to find that he was compelled to vote against the further progress of the Bill. He believed that the work would be a most beneficial one for Ireland. But it should be remembered that that was the first case of gross and palpable fraud in connexion with the proceedings of railway companies that had been brought under their Lordships' notice; and he certainly thought that they ought not to allow those frauds to pass unpunished. He had a further reason for objecting to the passing of the Bill, and that objection was founded on the fact that their Lordships could have no security that the money necessary to construct the works would be forthcoming, and that those works would be completed.

The Earl of St. Germans said, he could not agree in the remark as to the peculiar character of the parties deceived. The directors were not unsophisticated Irishmen, but, for the most part, gentlemen resident in London. It would not, in his opinion, be desirable that the House should interrupt the labours of the Committee on the Bill. It appeared to him, on the contrary, that they ought to allow that Committee to proceed, and to hear all the evidence that could be adduced in the case. He believed that it would be quite consistent with the practice of Parliament to allow supplementary subscription lists to be put in, and that practice might be adopted in the present case. He did not ask their Lordships to pause before they determined on rejecting the measure, on the ground that they should look more favourably on the Bill because it was one affecting Ireland, than they would look on a Bill affecting England. All he asked was, that justice might be done in the matter. He admitted that a case of great laxity and carelessness had been made out against the promoters of the line, but he did not think that they ought at once to determine at that stage on rejecting the Bill. Let the Select Committee proceed with its inquiries, and pronounce a decision on the merits of the case, after they had heard all the evidence that could be brought forward on the subject.

Lord Beaumont said, that he should not have had the least hesitation in acceding to the Motion of the noble Earl, if he thought that by rejecting the Bill he would be punishing the parties who had committed those frauds. But the fact was, that they would not by that means be punishing those parties, but innocent persons, who had in no way contributed to those frauds. The individuals who had fraudulently obtained the scrip had since parted with it, at a considerable profit to themselves; and that scrip was now held by persons who were ready and able to pay up the amount of their shares. It appeared that they could not punish even the managers; for those managers had sold out the 500 shares which each of them had taken in the first instance. In his opinion, their Lordships ought, if possible, to adopt such measures as would prevent the sale of scrip immediately after it had been allotted; for that was the source of all the most objectionable proceedings in connexion with railway speculations. He considered the fairest course would be for the Committee to enter upon the consideration of the preamble of the Bill, and ascertain whether there were funds sufficient to carry out the project in case the Bill should ultimately pass. But he had only to observe in conclusion, that it seemed to him very expedient that the House should, without delay, adopt some general measure for the prevention of the perpetration of any similar frauds in future.

The Duke of Cleveland fully agreed in the sentiment expressed by the noble Lord who had just sat down, that it was most desirable for that House to take some means to prevent such frauds as those complained of from being practised. It was alleged as an excuse for the conduct of the Company under consideration, that similar practices were carried on in all Railway Bills; but that was no ground for permitting a fraud which was detected from being punished. The present case was, it seemed, the first one in which those frauds had been found out; and it was then certainly the duty of Parliament to take cognizance of that which had been detected. The time had arrived when it became absolutely necessary to endeavour to put an end to the system of jobbing which was now going on; and before the present Session terminated he thought it indispensable that the Legislature should come to some general resolution on the subject—a course which would deter the promoters of railways hereafter from pursuing the line of conduct which they now did. One way he would suggest, by which he conceived the evil alluded to might be remedied, and that was, to introduce a clause into every Railway Bill to prevent parties to whom shares were allotted, and who were subscribers to the subscription contract, from selling their scrip until at least two-thirds of the money should have been paid up. He hoped the House would not suffer the Session to pass, however advanced it might be in the year, without coming to some general resolution on this subject.

Lord Redesdale said, the real question before their Lordships was this:—A charge had been brought against certain parties of not having complied with the rules and regulations required by that House to be observed in its proceedings, and that charge having been fully brought home to them, were these parties to be allowed to go scot free? It was said, indeed, that their Lordships would not be punishing the guilty individuals; that the weight of their censure would fall upon those who purchased shares bonâ fide. Now those who had purchased shares knew very well they were doing an illegal act; and they should, therefore, be satisfied to take the risk and the consequences of their own conduct. The question here was, not whether or not this Bill would be a good measure for Ireland, but whether that House was prepared or not to uphold its own rules and Standing Orders? If it was a reason that these parties should not be punished because others had been guilty of similar practices, not a pickpocket who was detected in his guilt but might say, "Oh, you ought not to inflict punishment on me alone; there are twenty other persons picking pockets in the same place, you caught me—am I alone to suffer?" He had only to say in conclusion, that this was an occasion on which the House ought to enforce its own rules, if it did not make up its mind to let them be all considered as mere waste paper in future.

Lord Monteagle feared that when once a spirit of gambling got abroad, it would be impossible for any measures they might introduce to repress it. There were many laws at this moment in existence to prevent fraudulent practices, but they were found insufficient for that purpose. He doubted very much whether throwing out the present Bill would lead to any such salutary consequences as were calculated on. But at the same time, he should say that after the fraud which had been discovered in this matter, to pass this Bill now, would be productive of mischievous results. The House having adopted certain rules and regulations for the management of its business, was bound to enforce them; and though he confessed he did so with some reluctance, believing that this measure was calculated to be of great benefit to Ireland, he felt constrained to give his vote in favour of the Motion of the noble Earl behind him (the Earl of Besborough). He did not think that those gentlemen who took an active part in the management of this Company were guilty of fraud themselves; but they had not acted with sufficient caution, and were bound to have used more care in preventing the interests of others which were entrusted to them from suffering through their neglect. The rejection of the measure, however, did not by any means prejudice the undertaking hereafter; and as it was one calculated to be of great benefit to Ireland, he regretted that it should be postponed even for a time.

The Earl of Devon would briefly state why he intended to vote against the proposition then before the House. He would be glad to know how it was in any way necessary to the ends of justice that this Bill should be thrown out? Who were the parties to whom they were doing justice by rejecting this measure? Was it necessary to do so, with respect to the individual who had presented a petition to that House? Was it in justice to the landed proprietors through whose properties the line was to pass, that they adopted this course? Was it in justice to any other project that might be more advantageous, that they were called upon to throw out this Bill? No such thing. It was merely in justice to the House of Lords itself they were asked to do so. Now, such being the case, he thought there were peculiar circumstances in this matter which made it fit for them to consider whether it was right to take this means of vindicating their own orders. The Report of the Select Committee charged certain promoters of the Bill with having been guilty of frauds. Now, he did not think there was any evidence before it which sustained such an allegation. It was said the course the House was about adopting was for the purpose of punishing the parties who infringed its Standing Orders. Now, they would not be punishing those parties; they would be punishing others. Was not the arm of the law, however, sufficiently long to reach those who were really guilty? The throwing out of a measure of so much importance as that was not the way to proceed. They might, even in vindicating their own orders, commit a great public evil in attempting to punish parties who were guilty of a fraud that they could not reach after all. He concluded by announcing his intention to oppose the Motion before the House.

The Marquess of Clanricarde, in explanation, observed that, notwithstanding all the allegations they heard about the Standing Orders, the reception of that petition had been an infringement upon them, such as had not taken place on any other Railway Bill in England or Scotland.

The Earl of Besborough then briefly replied.

The Duke of Wellington wished to make only one observation on what had fallen from his noble Friend near him (the Earl of Devon). There could be no doubt that the evidence went to show that nothing more could be charged against the directors than negligence in the performance of their duty. He had to observe, that in the commencement of the Report, the directors had been called upon, if they thought proper, to answer those charges, but as they had not thought fit to do so, he thought the proposition of the noble Lord must fall to the ground.

On Question, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Motion? House divided :—Contents 35; Non-contents 8 ; Majority 27.

Resolved in the Affirmative, and the further consideration of the Bill put off for three months.

NEW STANDING ORDER.] The Marquess of Lansdowne rose to propose the adoption of a Standing Order of which he had given notice. His attention had been called to the subject, in consequence of a court of justice, after full consideration, having determined that a special case should be made, for the purpose of trial by full court, of the simple and legal question, whether a person whose name was inserted in the Act of Parliament, although there was no proof of his having consented to its being inserted, was sufficient evidence of his being a director of the company to which the Act alluded? Whatever might be the result of that proceeding, he thought it was necessary for the protection of their Lordships and the public, that they should adopt the Standing Order he was about to propose. It was well known that it was the common practice to insert names of persons as directors of a company who had no knowledge whatever of its existence, for the purpose of inducing the ignorant multitude to embark their property in the undertaking. For the protection of the public, therefore, as well as of individuals, it was necessary that some such Standing Order as that which he had to propose should be adopted by their Lordships. The noble Marquess then laid on the Table a Resolution, that when in any Bill to be hereafter introduced for the purpose of establishing a Company for carrying on any work or undertaking, the names of any person or persons should be introduced as manager, director, proprietor, or otherwise concerned in carrying such a Bill into effect, proof shall be required before the Standing Orders' Committee, that the said person or persons had subscribed their names to the petition for the said Bill, or to a printed copy of the Bill, as brought up or introduced into the House.

Motion to be taken into further consideration on Friday next.

POOR LAW (SCOTLAND) BILL.] On the Motion of the Duke of Buccleuch, the Bill was read a third time.

On Question, that the Bill do pass,

The Marquess of Breadalbane said, that the Government would best consult the interest of Scotland, if they postponed the passing of that measure till next Session. If they persisted in passing it during the present, the consequence would be, that they would have to bring in a Bill to amend it next Session.

Lord Cottenham proposed to strike out the 17th Clause, which had no connexion with the Bill, and which went to unite South Leith to Edinburgh, for the purpose of parochial assessment for the poor, which was in direct opposition to the judgment of the Court of Session, and that of their Lordships, on the point involved in it.

The Duke of Buccleuch said, he could not consent to the omission of the clause. The decision of their Lordships had made the alteration in the law necessary.

Lord Campbell was surprised that Her Majesty's Government should still persist in this clause, which would bring a reproach on the Government. It completely reversed the decision of that House, confirming the decision of the Court below, on an appeal which he, as an advocate, supported, and his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cottenham), as Judge, being at the time Lord Chancellor, gave his unprejudiced opinion in favour of that decision. He had no hesitation in saying, therefore, that to attempt to upset it by a clause of this kind would be regarded as an iniquitous proceeding. He trusted, that his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack would not hesitate to give the House the benefit of his opinion judicially upon the subject.

The Earl of Dalhousie defended the clause as a simple measure of justice. There was no intention whatever in proposing it to impugn the decision of that House, or to question the correctness of the opinion as to the law of the case laid down by noble and learned Lords opposite; but he was certainly astonished to hear it now argued, that because that House had decided that the law was so and so, therefore the Legislature was to be precluded from altering it. He admitted, that by the law, as it existed, the parishioners of South Leith were liable to be assessed for Edinburgh; but it was most unjust that they should be so, and he hoped their Lordships would not refuse them relief by acceding to this clause.

The Lord Chancellor said, he had read the case, and looked at the Act of Parliament, and would state his impression as briefly as possible. In the year 1756 the Heriot Hospital was the owner of the ground in question. That hospital had granted it under a certain contract to the persons under whom the present parties claimed. That was a contract for building houses, and it was provided that, if upon any future occasion it should be taken within the royalty of Edinburgh, it should pay poor-rate burdens to that city. It was clear that the contract entered into between these parties could not affect the parish of Leith, and the land in question was liable to pay parochial burdens to the parish of Leith. Therefore, in consequence of this contract, if the land in question had been included within the royalty of Edinburgh, it would have been liable to pay parochial burdens both to that city and to the parish of Leith. It was clear that that would be the effect of the contract between the parties, because no contract between particular individuals could affect the rights of the parish of Leith. The next point of the case was this—an Act of Parliament was passed ten years afterwards for the purpose of carrying the contract into effect. It recited the terms and provisions of the contract, and declared in express terms, according to the stipulations of the contract, that the spot in question should be included in the royalty of Edinburgh, and contribute to the public burdens of the city of Edinburgh. It had been said that it dissevered or disjoined that district from the rest of the parish of Leith; but although it did so, it said, in express terms, it should continue to contribute to the public burdens of the parish of Leith as heretofore. If there had been no Act of Parliament, the contract would have imposed double burdens. The Act of Parliament did not vary the case; on the contrary, it confirmed it, and in express terms stipulated that it should be liable to double burdens. That was the case decided before the Lord Ordinary, and the Court of Session, in conformity with the contract and the terms of the Act of Parliament. It afterwards came before their Lordships' House, and was argued at the bar, and their Lordships confirmed the decision of the Court below on the same grounds, viz., on the footing of the contract. Now what was the state of the case? The parties who held the property at this time, held it subject to all the liabilities of the original agreement, by which they were bound. The agreement passed with the land, with the title, and the parties were as much bound by the contract as the original contractors, and that was the decision of their Lordships' House. Under these circumstances what was now proposed to be done? It had been decided that the property was to be arranged between the parties by a certain mode. Their Lordships were now interposing after that decision, and, by Act of Parliament, practically to reverse it. They were saying this right shall be decided in a different way. If two parties litigated together in a court of law, and the decision was in favour of A, would it be reasonable to come to the Legislature and say, "Although the right is with A, we will legislate and say that in future the right shall be with B?" And that was really the case in the present instance. He had been called upon judicially to give his opinion, and he felt bound, however favourably disposed towards the measure, to say that he concurred in the decision that had already been pronounced on the question. Whatever decision their Lordships might come to, he was bound to state his real opinion.

He did not believe that the parties anticipated all the consequences of such a contract—that they would be liable to be taxed according to their "means and substance," and not according to the value of the land. The effect of it was hard, because persons residing in the district were liable to be taxed, not according to the value of the land, but by their means and substance, to Leith and also to Edinburgh. That was no doubt a case of extreme hardship, but still it was a contract, and a binding contract. Whether their Lordships would interpose and put an end to it, was for their Lordships to determine.

Lord Campbell trusted, after the declaration of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, that the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Buccleuch) would at once withdraw the clause.

The Earl of Haddington, speaking as a legislator, and not judicially, was of opinion that the clause ought to be retained; for the purpose of removing the hardship complained of.

Lord Cottenham felt extremely surprised that the Government should persist in transferring, by Act of Parliament, the property belonging to one man into the hands of another. He was quite certain that the clause had been framed by parties who knew nothing of the facts; and he could not imagine how the clause could be retained, after the opinion delivered by his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor.

The Duke of Wellington said, it was rather unfortunate, that in the consideration of this question, the abstract legal question should have been mixed up a little with party views. It certainly did appear to him, when the question was first started, that the legal question was brought forward very much with the view of promoting the postponement of the consideration of the Bill to a distant period. His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack had stated his entire concurrence in the legal opinion of the noble and learned Lords opposite; and, most undoubtedly, notwithstanding the law was intended to make a great alteration in the system of administering the Poor Law in Scotland, and most particularly on this very spot—in the very locality which was the subject of this clause, he felt that it was absolutely impossible for the House, upon a question of this description, to differ in opinion with such authorities as the two noble and learned Lords opposite, backed by the opinion of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. Under these circumstances, he should recommend his noble Friend to withdraw the clause.

The Duke of Buccleuch, after what had fallen from his noble Friend, said he would not persist in pressing the clause.

Clause omitted.

Bill passed.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS AND PAUPER LUNATICS BILL.] The Lord Chancellor said, he would take the opportunity, before the House went into Committee on this Bill, which was a Bill to regulate the care and treatment of Lunatics, of briefly stating the nature and objects of the measure. The subject was one of deep interest, as their Lordships would concur with him in thinking, when he told them that at this moment there were nearly 21,000 lunatics in England and Wales, a great proportion of whom were paupers, who would in a certain degree come within the range of the Bill now under consideration. Before the year 1774, before the 14th Geo. III., there was no adequate protection for persons in that unhappy condition: not only was scarcely any adequate protection afforded to them by law, but they were often made the instruments of fraud in order to obtain possession of property, and for other unjustifiable abuses. The Statute 14th Geo. III. did, to a certain degree, afford a remedy; but its provisions were in many instances neglected, and were in many other instances found wholly inadequate to meet the evils they were intended to remedy. The law remained in this state until 1830, when a friend of his, with whom he was on terms of intimacy, in the other House of Parliament, Mr. Robert Gordon, directed his attention to the subject; and, after a good deal of consideration, embodied his views in a Bill, which afterwards passed into a law, in the 2nd and 3rd year of the late King, by which Commissioners were appointed with powers to license houses for the reception of lunatics, within a certain district round the metropolis, and to visit establishments of this nature all over the kingdom. Other provisions were also adopted for the purpose of remedying the evils to which he had referred. That Bill was a mere temporary measure, to endure, he believed, for three years, or to the end of the next Session of Parliament. That was a considerable improvement. Former experiments having failed, Parliament had no confidence that any settlement of the matter could be effected by this Act. The measure, however, worked so satisfactorily during the period to which he had referred, that before it expired it was again renewed, with some alterations, by the unanimous consent of both Houses of Parliament. It continued in force for another period of three or nearly four years, and application was again made to Parliament to renew the provisions of the Act, with further alterations and additions which experience had suggested; so that the Act had been twice renewed. It was now on the point of expiring, after an experience of twelve years; and the satisfactory manner in which its provisions had worked, the wholesome discipline exercised through its means over this unhappy class of persons, in the opinion of the Government, rendered it advisable to embody its provisions in a permanent measure. A noble Lord (Lord Ashley), one of the Commissioners under the Act, who had attended most sedulously in the performance of his duty as an unpaid Commissioner, and who on all occasions had displayed the greatest activity, wherever motives of humanity called for his exertions, was the author of this Bill, and introduced it into the other House of Parliament. It would be necessary for him to state, now that the Act was intended to be made a permanent measure, what alterations, suggested by experience, it would be desirable to introduce into the Bill. During the last year, a Report of the Lunacy Commissioners had been laid on the Tables of both Houses of Parliament, pointing out the defects of the existing system, the manner in which they might be remedied, and suggesting various additions to the existing provisions. The first alteration, which was rendered necessary, indeed, by the measure becoming permanent, was the permanent appointment of the Commissioners. The present Commissioners were twenty in number, of whom eleven were paid, consisting of barristers and physicians, or medical practitioners; the remaing nine being gentlemen who performed their duties gratuitously from motives of benevolence. It was proposed by the present Bill to reduce the number of paid Commissioners to six, and of the unpaid Commissioners to five. The whole number of Commissioners, under the present Bill, would therefore be eleven. While the measure was temporary, it followed as a matter of course that the paid Commissioners were also temporary; they were renewed every year, and the same individuals were retained; the gentlemen originally appointed having shown themselves most efficient in the discharge of their duties. The consequence of having Commissioners appointed for such short periods was, that you could not abstract them entirely from the professions to which they belonged, and to which it would be impossible for them to return with advantage after an absence of four or five years. This, undoubtedly, led to considerable inconvenience; for that their professional occupations should occasionally clash with their attendance for the purposes of the Commission, was inevitable: it was, therefore, thought expedient, in making the Commission permanent, to secure the attention of its members exclusively to the duties required by it. They were not to be allowed to practise either in the professions of law or medicine, but they would be required to give their entire attention to the duties of their office as Commissioners. By deciding upon this, they were enabled to diminish the number of Com missioners in the proportion which he had just stated. Another change, which had been the subject of some comment, was the mode in which it was proposed to remunerate them for their services. Under the existing Act, they were paid by means of fees for their attendance at boards, and a certain allowance which they received for travelling expenses in visiting the various establishments of the country. The scale of remuneration was one guinea for every hour they attended at the board, and five guineas for every day's attendance in the country, besides, he believed, an additional guinea for sustenance during the journey. Instead of this, it was proposed to remunerate them by means of a fixed salary; for considerable inconvenience was found to result from the former mode; for if the whole eleven paid Commissioners happened to attend a board, and the proceedings lasted four or five hours, the expense of the board might amount to 50*l.*; and it sometimes happened that scrupulous members, fearing lest they might be suspected of consulting their own interests rather than the performance of their duty to the public, were often unwilling to hold boards. He was aware that the new mode was regarded by some as calculated to lead to increased expenditure; but that was a mistaken idea, for the result would be a saving, as he trusted he should be able to satisfy their Lordships in Committee. The salary pro posed to be given to each paid Commissioner was 1,500*l.* a year, making a yearly expense of 9,000*l.* for the whole number; and it turned out on inquiry that the expenses of the Commission last year exceeded that sum; so that their Lordships would find a considerable diminution in expense effected from circumstances to which he would now refer. By the effect of this Bill, the duties of the Commissioners would be greatly increased and extended; so that if they were still paid by fees, they would necessarily receive much larger incomes than they obtained under the existing Act for the discharge of their additional duties. The Commissioners were named in the Bill; they were not named by him (the Lord Chancellor), but with his approbation. They were selected from the existing Commissioners, and were some of the most able and most efficient of that respectable and honourable body; and he felt assured that all those of their Lordships acquainted with the subject, and with the qualifications of the gentlemen so named, would be perfectly satisfied that the selection was a most judicious one. So much with regard to that part of the subject. He had stated that the duties of the Commissioners were to be extended. It was a very singular circumstance, that although the Commissioners had the power of visiting all private asylums, they had no power to visit hospitals; subscription hospitals, in fact, were out of the range of the existing Act; they were entirely out of the range of the regulations imposed by law. It was not necessary for a party to be received into a subscription hospital that he should have a certificate or an order; he was received as a matter of course, and these hospitals could not be visited by the Commissioners. A provision had, therefore, been introduced into the present Bill, empowering the Commissioners to visit establishments of this description; and he felt assured their Lordships would join with him in thinking that a due supervision and scrutiny by experienced and intelligent persons, was just as necessary in these establishments as in private asylums; would prove most advantageous for the public interest; and would conduce greatly to the comfort and happiness of those subject to such a calamity, and afford an additional hope of their ultimate restoration to reason. Another improvement in the Bill, to which he was anxious to direct their attention, was one of considerable importance. At present, paupers were confined, by order of the justices, on production of a medical certificate; but it was not necessary that the justice who sent him into confinement should see the pauper; and it frequently happened that paupers were sent into confinement without being seen by the justice signing the order. It was certainly necessary that the certificate should be recent; but everything was vague and indefinite on this point. The present Bill required that no pauper should be confined unless he should have been seen immediately before by the person signing the order, and that no medical certificate should be allowed except where the person signing it had seen the pauper within seven days of the period of his confinement. Their Lordships, he trusted, would see the great importance of establishing salutary guards in a system of this description. Another point which it was material to consider was, that these visitors would be empowered to examine and inspect any establishment where any pauper might be confined, or was supposed to be confined. They were not to interfere with Poor Law Guardians or with the Poor Law Commissioners; but if they saw anything requiring amendment, it would be their duty to report it to the Poor Law Commissioners, so that it might be rectified. Their Lordships would also find a power conferred in the Bill of visiting gaols. This was a material provision, introduced into the Bill for the purpose of extending the operation of the former Act. There was another most important point to which he wished to draw their attention. He did not know how it happened, but in the first Bill introduced, although every establishment of this description was liable to inspection, and was put under the jurisdiction of the Commissioners, when the Bill came up to their Lordships' House, a clause was introduced for the purpose of exempting what were called "single" houses—that is, houses where only one patient was confined. It was considered a matter of delicacy that such establishments should be screened. Now, it had always struck him that these, above all others, were the establishments which required to be examined and inspected with the greatest degree of vigilance, being more liable to be made the means of abuse, and of inflicting cruelty on patients. A power was certainly given to the Lord Chancellor, on sufficient information being adduced to warrant an inquiry, to direct an inspection; but when he informed their Lordships that, although he had held the Great Seal for several years, he did not remember a single application of this kind ever having been made, he apprehended they would be of opinion that this remedy was not of a very effectual kind. One provision with respect to these houses was this: they were not obliged to make a return until a year after the patient had been placed there. Now, it was notorious that there were a great number of such houses in which single patients were confined, yet the number of returns did not exceed thirty or forty a year; and he understood that it was by no means unusual to transfer patients from one asylum to another, in order to evade the return. If it were left to him, he confessed he should be for placing these establishments on precisely the same footing as the rest. Such a course, however, did not seem palatable to their Lordships; and, as a different course had been pursued by the other House of Parliament, he was willing to recommend that course for their Lordships' adoption. Certificates would be required, and returns must be made to the Commissioners, when any person was lodged in an establishment of this kind, and a year would not be allowed to elapse, as formerly. The visiting of these establishments was not to be open to all the Commissioners; but the Chancellor was to have the power of selecting two, for the purpose of private inspection. These provisions appeared to him a great improvement on the former law. Their Lordships were aware, that in a matter of lunacy, the Lord Chancellor did not put himself in motion; he could only act on an application being made to him, upon which he ordered an inquiry, if the case seemed to warrant it; after which he took possession of the property, and made an order for its proper application. But a party might possess a great deal of property, and might be confined in a lunatic asylum—perhaps in an asylum for the reception of one patient merely, on the certificate of a medical man, without any commission whatever issuing, unless a petition were made to the Lord Chancellor for that purpose. What became of the property? It was wholly unprotected; and, in many instances, those who had obtained possession of it, after paying the allowance for the lunatic in an asylum for a year or two, dissipated or lost the whole of it. Many such cases had come under his own notice. Under this Bill, the Lord Chancellor was empowered to appoint a receiver of the property, and a guardian of the person of the lunatic; and then, if there should appear no prospect of ultimate recovery, the Lord Chancellor might order a commission of lunacy. These were the principal alterations proposed. There was another subject to which he would briefly call their attention. At present, persons who kept private asylums were in the habit of receiving as boarders, persons suffering from a nervous temperament, or a weak understanding. These individuals were without any guard or protection, and were allowed sometimes to execute instruments binding their property. Now, these cases it was highly necessary to subject to some control; the present Bill prohibited private asylums from taking any inmates of this description. There was another abuse to which he would also advert. Notwithstanding the provisions of the Bill, and the activity and vigilance of the Commissioners, it was found impossible to detect all the windings by which due inspection was sometimes defeated. The Commissioners were allowed to inspect every part of these asylums; but it was necessary that they should exercise their utmost vigilance to see, that they discovered every part. In more than one instance, series of apartments had been discovered entirely concealed from view, and to which the Commissioners had never been allowed admission. In one instance, the Commissioners, by mere accident, discovered three sleeping cells of such a description that they would not have been allowed for a moment, if they had been open to inspection; and would, in all probability, have caused the keeper of the house to lose his license. It was, therefore, proposed in the present Bill, not only to empower the Commissioners to examine every part of a building, but to make it the duty of the keeper or superintendent to show every part of the house, making him liable, for neglect of this duty, to animadversion and punishment. The noble Lord then moved that the House should go into Committee on the Bill.

The Earl of Eldon, in general, approved of the Bill; and he had no intention of doing more than moving that the Warneford Hospital, near Oxford, upon which a private individual had bestowed several thousand pounds, be exempted from its operation, he having been entrusted with a petition from the noblemen and gentlemen who superintended it, praying to that effect.

Lord Monteagle was of opinion that the certainty of a degree of supervision and inspection, would be a guarantee for the introduction of all the improved practice of treatment into those institutions, and would induce persons more readily to endow them; and he was sorry that the Bill was not extended to Ireland.

House in Committee. Amendments made. Report thereof to be received on Thursday.

The House adjourned at 11 o'clock, until Thursday.

Fielden, Brothers, of Halifax, and from several other Factories, in favour of the Ten Hours System in Factories.—By Viscount Sandon, from Congregation of Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, worshipping in Prussia Street, Liverpool, and from Dissenting Congregations of a great number of other places, for Alteration of Law relating to Promiscuous Intercourse.—By Lord Ashley, from Inhabitants of Warrington, for Diminishing the Number of Public Houses.—By Mr. T. Duncombe, from John Wilkes, of 64 Pershore Street, Birmingham, for Inquiry into the Treatment of his Son, whilst in the Queen's Hospital, Birmingham.—By Mr. Hutt, from Proprietors of Land in South Australia, for a General Assembly there.—By Mr. Hutt, from Stockholders and others, of New South Wales, for Repeal of certain Acts relating to that Colony.

House met at twelve o'clock.

SMALL DEBTS (No. 3) BILL.] On the Question, that the Small Debts Bill (No. 3) be read a third time,

Mr. H. Berkeley said, he would be sorry to cause any impediment to the passing of this Bill; inasmuch as he admitted that it contained a great deal of good. He thought that much evil would be inflicted on the people by the exercise of that power given to the Secretary of State by the 8th Clause. The Secretary of State was by this clause empowered to extend or diminish the jurisdiction of the courts, so as to equalize them all. He hoped that the right hon. Baronet would be induced to alter it.

Sir J. Graham could hold out no hope of the kind; for he considered the clause to be highly necessary to give effect to the principle of the Bill.

Bill read a third time and passed.

REGULATION OF CUSTOMS.] The Customs Regulation Bill was read a Third time.

Mr. Wawn trusted that vessels returning to a British port in ballast, after landing a cargo at another British port, would be exempted from the pilotage dues exacted from foreign vessels. The hon. Member moved to leave certain words to give effect to this distinction.

Captain Pechell seconded the Amendment.

Mr. Corry thought the Amendment was brought forward at too late a period of the Session; and he should distinctly oppose any alteration in the clause.

The House divided on the Question, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill:—Ayes 11; Noes 26: Majority 15.

Bill passed.

JOINT STOCK BANKS (SCOTLAND AND IRELAND).] On the Motion for going into Committee upon the Joint Stock Banks (Scotland and Ireland) Bill,

Mr. Bouverie objected to the measure, because it was to have a retrospective effect, and would counteract that Act of the Legislature which had been passed at an earlier period of the Session upon the subject, upon the faith of which engagements had been entered into which would be seriously affected by this Bill, if it was permitted to pass into a law. He should, therefore, move that it be committed this day three months.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that he did not think the hon. Member was borne out in his statement by the facts of the case. He merely wished the House to go, pro formâ, into Committee now, for the purpose of postponing the arguments upon it until Friday next, when it would be recommitted, and when the extent of the objections to the measure could be satisfactorily known. There was to be a meeting of Scotch bankers to-morrow on the subject.

Mr. P. M. Stewart protested against the principle of pressing forward this Bill, because the Scotch bankers were said to be favourable to it. They would, of course, be glad that this measure should pass; because it would have the effect of increasing their monopoly, and preventing new banks being established. This was a question which ought to be decided by the mercantile interests of Scotland, who were directly opposed to it. He merely asked the right hon. Gentleman to delay this Bill until they could fairly take the opinion of the people of Scotland upon its merits.

The House went into Committee.

Clauses were agreed to.

The House resumed. Report to be received.

The House then adjourned till five o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS—RAILWAYS.] At the five o'clock sittings, the Report of the Standing Orders' Revision Committee was further considered.

Various Amendments were agreed to.

On Standing Order 39A, the Committee proposed that the amount of deposit on railway shares should be one-tenth, or 10 per cent., instead of 5 per cent.

Lord G. Somerset said, the Committee made this proposition on the expectation that speculation would be as rife this year as it was at present, and in consequence of the recent disclosures in Parliament, it was necessary to procure a more respectable body of shareholders. The Amendment of Standing Order 128 had reference to Ireland, and required that notices to landholders should be deposited with the clerks of the Unions.

On the Question that the Amendment be read a second time,

Sir R. Ferguson considered such a sudden call upon all railways would work most detrimentally to the schemes as public works, and prove a source of very considerable injustice to those persons who had already signed contracts upon the faith of their being required to deposit only 5*l.* per cent. He moved to omit the words "one-tenth" for the purpose of inserting "one-twentieth."

Sir G. Clerk hoped the House would agree to the Amendment suggested by the Committee in their Report. Considering the mania for speculation which had been exhibited in this country during the past year, and the mode in which the share lists had been proved to have been filled up, he considered that the Committee were perfectly justified in their recommendation, and that the House ought, upon public grounds, to adopt it. Were the Standing Orders so amended, the public would have some security for the completion of the projects by the necessarily increased respectability of the parties promoting them.

Mr. Stuart Wortley also suggested the extreme inconvenience that would be caused to shareholders in projected companies by the adoption of this rule.

Dr. Bowring observed, that the effect of the rule would be to give an unfair advantage in the case of those railroads which were already formed, and to operate as a great injustice on those which were only projected.

Mr. E. B. Denison said, that the effect of this order would be most unjust on those shareholders who had signed the Parliamentary deeds on the faith of the existing orders, and who had been led to believe that only a certain amount would be demanded of them until an Act of Parliament was obtained.

Mr. Greene observed, that the injustice of the proposed arrangement might be obviated by confining its operation to companies hereafter to be projected, and not applying it to those which were provisionally registered, or in which the deposits had been paid and the deeds signed.

Lord G. Somerset said, that some such regulation as this appeared absolutely necessary, in order to stop the mania for speculating in railway shares. He doubted very much whether the rule would be found to operate so injuriously as was supposed, and whether the cases in which the increased deposit would be readily paid would not so far preponderate as to render it scarcely necessary to consider the others.

Sir R. Ferguson did not consider that the alteration would prove any guarantee that the share lists were not filled up by fictitious names in the very same manner as heretofore. However, as the feeling of the House seemed to be in favour of the proposition of the noble Lord, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment withdrawn. Numerous alterations in the Standing Orders agreed to.

CASE OF COLONEL LAUTOUR.] Mr. Milner Gibson rose to move—

"That a Select Committee be appointed, to investigate the allegations contained in the Petition of Colonel Augustus Lautour, presented to this House June the 6th, 1844, and printed with the Votes June the 26th, 1844, and to report their opinion to the House."

The claim was founded upon these circumstances. Certain regulations were issued by the Colonial Office in December, 1828, relative to the granting of lands at the Swan River, and containing a stipulation for reclaiming them within a period of twenty-one years. In conformity with these regulations, Colonel Lautour expended a sum of 40,000*l.*, and sent out 200 labourers to the settlement; but a question had subsequently arisen whether these regulations were binding upon the Government. This being the ground of the doubt, subsequent regulations were issued in January, 1829, declaring that if lands were not reclaimed within ten years, they should revert absolutely to the Crown. In this state of affairs, the Crown having set up a claim to the possession of Colonel Lautour's lands at the expiration of ten years, and the claim being contested, the question was referred to the law officers of the Crown, and both the Attorney and Solicitor General gave their opinions that the regulations of 1828 were binding. Subsequently, however, the present Government referred the question to Sir Thomas Wilde, and he declared that the former opinion was delivered upon an imperfect statement and an erroneous view of the case, and stated that he had then no doubt that the regulations of 1828 were invalid, because they had not been officially promulgated. An argument, however, was raised that Colonel Lautour had put himself out of court by his own admission, in a letter addressed to Mr. Horace Twiss when Under Secretary for the Colonies, in which the petitioner assured that functionary that his capital had been invested on the faith of the original regulations, and expressed a hope that he should not be considered intrusive in "soliciting the indulgence" of twenty-one years instead of ten. Now, this might be said to be a courteous mode of insisting upon a right; and, as in all contracts between the Crown and its subjects, a generous and forbearing construction ought to be put upon the terms, he trusted that no advantage would be taken of this expression of Colonel Lautour's, even if it were an inadvertence. It appeared to him that this claim of Colonel Latour's was founded upon justice, and he hoped it would receive the indulgent consideration of the Government.

Mr. G. W. Hope said, it was admitted on the part of Colonel Lautour, that if he was only entitled under the regulations of 1829, he had no claim whatever. Now, the publication of the regulations was essential to their validity, and there was not the slightest evidence that those of December, 1828, ever were published. Sir Thomas Wilde, in his more recent opinion, declared most decisively that there was no claim under the regulations of 1828. [Mr. Gibson: Because they had not been published.] There were other reasons also. Colonel Lautour had not complied with the conditions. Sir Thomas Wilde stated, as the hon. Member had said, that his former opinion was founded upon an imperfect statement of the case. The fact was, that Colonel Lautour had got 100,000 acres to which he had no title, and then he came forward with that as a ground why he should get 140,000 more. The hon. Gentleman then read a letter from Colonel Lautour, written at the latter end of the year 1829, and received at the Colonial Office in the January following, and which, he contended, was in itself a sufficient answer to the claim.

Mr. Milner Gibson would not press the Motion to a division; but he trusted that he had said enough to induce Her Majesty's Government to take the subject into their consideration.

Motion withdrawn.

House adjourned at a quarter to seven o'clock.

SCINDE.] Mr. Hume wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether any instructions had been sent out by Government, or the Board of Control, relative to the division of the plunder taken in Scinde; and if so, whether the right hon. Gentleman would object to the production of a copy of any minute of Council on the subject?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the subject was at present under the consideration of the Treasury and the Board of Control.

Mr. Hume wished to know whether any minute on the subject would be ready to be sent out by the India mail, which would leave on Monday?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer hardly thought that it would be ready by that time.

Subject at an end.

EDUCATION IN MALTA.] Mr. C. Buller said, he understood that the hon. Member the Under Secretary of the Colonies was prepared to give an answer to the question of which he had given notice respcting the state of education in Malta. He was anxious to be informed as to the measures taken by the Government to carry out the recommendations of the Commissioners with respect to the promotion of education in that Colony. The population of the Colony amounted to 118,000 persons, a number so very considerable, that it rendered the duty of promoting education amongst them more imperative on the Government. The revenue of the Colony amounted to 120,000*l.*, or a little more than 1*l.* per head pe annum; and, according to the general principles on which we acted with respect to those Colonies which had large populations, a sum proportionate to the population and the revenue ought to be expended in promoting education amongst the people. On looking at the Estimates, however, he found that only 4,000*l.* had been expended in promoting education amongst the native inhabitants of Malta. This sum, he thought, was not sufficient for that purpose. Great hopes had been excited in the Colony by the Report of the Commissioners, and it was understood that, as one result of that Report, the Government would adopt measures for the education of young men, so as to qualify them to undertake the duties of schoolmasters on their return to Malta. With that view two young men were sent from Malta to London for the purpose of education in one of the model schools here. Unfortunately one of these young men died here. The other remained until his education was completed; but on his return to Malta it was found that after the expenses incurred on his account, there was no employment for him as a teacher, and he was at length placed as a clerk in one of the Government departments. He should be glad to hear some explanation on this subject.

Mr. G. W. Hope said, that it was not his intention on that occasion to enter into the general question as to the state of education in Malta; but he could state from his own knowledge that there was a strong disposition on the part of the Government here and at Malta to consult the wishes of the inhabitants in every measure adopted for their improvement, and many things had been already done in the Colony with that view. But it was heardly necessary for him to say that in a population like that of Malta, many local prejudices existed calculated to impede any general measures for their improvement, particularly with respect to education. An attempt had been made to found an University there; but he was sorry to say that it had not had that success on which its promoters had calculated. This had arisen partly from the fact that it had been planned on too great a scale, and partly from the circumstance that the gentleman who had been selected as the president of the College, and those who were intended to act with him, did not work well together. That gentleman was removed, and his place was supplied by a Roman Catholic from the College of Stonyhurst, whose high character and qualifications gave good ground for hoping that under his care education would be greatly promoted in the Colony. It was not correct, then, to say that the interests of the inhabitants as to education had been neglected — far from it. Fourteen primary schools had been already established, and the College had been re-organized on a different basis from its original foundation. The hon. and learned Member was not correct in saying that only a sum of 4,000*l.* had been voted for the promotion of education. The fact was, that the sum was much nearer to 5,000*l.*; and more would be provided (as we understood) if required; and it was expected that another report on the subject would soon be made by the Government of Malta.

Subject dropped.

On the Question that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair to go into Committee of Supply, ABUSES UNDER THE INCOME TAX.] Mr. Fielden said, before going into Committee of Supply, he wished to bring forward a Motion of which he had given notice, relative to the treatment he and others had received under the Income Tax Act. He did intend to state the case he was going into on the Report of the Vote of 15,000*l.* granted by the House to defray the expenses of sheriffs and of officers of the Court of Exchequer; but the Report was brought up at near two o'clock in the morning, and that he thought a sufficient apology for not availing himself of the opportunity. He wished to know something about that Court of Exchequer—whether persons against whom its process issued were allowed to be heard in their defence or not, for until lately he did not know that an Englishman could be drawn into a court, and his goods seized by its order, without having an opportunity of stating to the court in some way his reason why the seizure should not take place. He thought he was justified in putting this question to the First Lord of the Treasury; for it so happened that in the year 1844 three processes had been issued against himself and his brothers out of that Court of Exchequer for the recovery of Income Tax for profits on trade for the years 1839, 1840, and 1841, and for the years 1840, 1841, and 1842, when, so far from having realized a profit on the average of either the first three years or the second three years, they had incurred a heavy loss in both periods. They had submitted proofs of that to the Income Tax Commissioners at Rochdale, the truth of which was not denied; but they confirmed their assessments, and his goods were seized and sold by the sheriff—goods were taken and sold to an amount exceeding the demand, and no account had been rendered to him and his brothers. He and his brothers had, it would seem, therefore, been sued by the Income Tax officers in the Court of Exchequer, and a judgment had been obtained, and his goods taken, all without his having an opportunity of appearing before the Court to prove the injustice of the demand. He did not understand such law as that; and when the House was asked to vote a sum of money to sustain that Court or its officers, he thought it was a fitting opportunity to state to the House the complaint he had to make against the Court, its officers, and all those who were executing the extraordinary powers of the new and hateful law of taxation under which we were living. He (Mr. Fielden) knew that, in his own case, the conduct of those who were executing that act was most arbitrary and unjust; and, as he feared very cruel acts of injustice were perpetrated on others, perhaps less able to bear up against the grievance, and less able to make their wrongs known, he brought his case forward in order to call the attention of the House and the Ministers to the subject. He knew that injustice had been done in his own case, and he wished to have an opportunity of proving it somewhere before a Committee of that House. A notice of another process being issued against himself and brothers had been received by them, dated the 9th of July instant, and it ran thus:—

"Office for Stamps and Taxes, Somerset House, London, July 9.

"Gentlemen — Her Majesty's Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes having directed immediate process to be issued for your arrears of taxes returned into the Exchequer, I beg to inform you that, in order to save the expenses of a levy by the sheriff, the amount must be paid to Mr. Peter Ormerod, of Todmorden, the collector, before the 19th instant. —I am, Gentlemen, your obedient servant,

" J. Timm,

" Solicitor for Stamps and Taxes.

" Arrears due 10th of October, 1844— Property Tax, 175*l.*

" Messrs. Fielden, Brothers."

" Todmorden, July 10.

" Sir—We have this day received yours of the 9th instant, which informs us that the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes have directed immediate process to be issued for our arrears of taxes, due on the 10th of October last. As we had written a letter to Mr. Gibbs, of Bury, and posted it to-day, on the subject to which your letter refers, we herewith enclose you a copy thereof, and request you to lay the same before the Commissioners for their consideration, and acquaint us with their decision thereon.—We are, Sir, your obedient servants, Fielden, Brothers.

" J. Timm, Esq. Solicitor for Stamps and Taxes, Somerset House, London."

" Todmorden, July 10.

" Sir—A schedule has been delivered to us by Mr. P. Ormerod, assessor for Todmorden and Walsden, requiring a return of your profits on trade for the year 1845, ending the 5th of April, 1846. It is impossible before the year has expired to make such a return. The returns we have made for each of the last three years have been altogether set aside by the Commissioners at Rochdale, who have assessed us in such amount for each year as they thought fit, giving us notice thereof, and of the days of appeal. We appealed against each assessment. On our appeal against the assessment for the first year, Mr. J. Fielden was, as required, first sworn, then examined, then told by the chairman that the Commissioners were invested with extraordinary powers of inquiry, and then had a precept given to him to be filled up and returned within seven days, requiring a debtor and creditor account of our gross and net profits for the year, which account was to be very full and particular. We returned the precept within the seven days, and stated the only way in which we could make out a debtor and creditor account in the manner the precept appeared to us to require. To this communication we have received no answer from the Commissioners, neither did they in the year of assessment make known to us the result of our appeal, although instructions how to act in our case were sent to them from the Office of Stamps and Taxes, Somerset House, which instructions were not obeyed. To prove the truth of our return for the second year, 1843, ending the 5th of April, 1844, Mr. John Fielden attended the Commissioners on the appeal day, and offered to produce our books, if required. They said they did not want to see them, and that they did not disbelieve his statement; but they confirmed their assessment, subject, however, to a revision, if, on the 5th day of April following, we could satisfy the Commissioners that our profits on the current year did not amount to the sum they had assessed us at. The chairman, on announcing the decision of the Board, said that 'they had been instructed by the officials present how to act.' In making our return for the third year, 1844, ending the 5th of April, 1845, we adopted a form sent to us by the receiving inspector, Mr. Walker, who, in a letter accompanying it, said, 'As promised on the appeal day, I beg to send you a skeleton account of income tax, and which, I suppose, will be satisfactory to the Commissioners if made out in this way.' Our account, however, made out in that way did not satisfy the Commissioners, but they reduced their assessment from 24,000*l.* to 12,000*l.* Our returns as to profit on our trade have all been 'nothing,' taking the average of the three years respectively, in conformity with rule 1, section 100, of the Income Tax Act. The first three years embraced 1839, 1840, and 1841; the second three years embraced 1840, 1841, and 1842; the third three years embraced 1841, 1842, and 1843; all which years, with the exception of the last, were notoriously years of bad trade and falling prices, causing heavy losses to the holders of large stocks of manufactured cotton fabrics, which was our case. Said four years, 1839, to 1842, was a period, too, in which bad debts to an enormous amount were made by ourselves and others, all which facts we stated again and again to the Commissioners on appeal; but neither our oath, the offer of our books, written debtor and creditor accounts, such as we gave in (the last of which was in the form suggested at the Board), nor any statements we have made, or examinations before the Commissioners, have secured us what is right and fair. Instead of which, our goods have been seized and sold at auction three times to satisfy unjust demands. Goods of more value than the demand have been seized and sold on each occasion, and no return has been made to us of either the proceeds of sales or of any surplus. The duty on the third year's assessment has been demanded of us; but we shall not pay it, because our business, taking the average of the three years embraced in our return, was a losing one, no interest whatever being charged during that period for the capital employed in it. Any return, therefore, by us for the present year, will be made to the Office of Stamps and Taxes, Somerset-house. Please own receipt of this by return of post, and oblige, Sir, your obedient servants,

"FIELDEN, BROTHERS.

"G. J. Gibbs, Esq., Surveyor of Taxes, Bury."

To the note addressed to the Commissioners on the 10th of July, the hon. Member said, that he received the following answer:—

"Stamps and Taxes, London, July 15.

"Gentlemen—The Board of Stamps and Taxes have had before them your letter of the 10th inst., addressed to their solicitor, upon the subject of his application for payment of the arrear of Income Tax due from you to the 10th of October last, together with the copy transmitted by you of your communication to the surveyor, Mr. Gibbs, stating the grounds on which you object to the assessment; and in reply, I am directed to inform you, that the General Commissioners of the district having on appeal decided that you were chargeable with the duty on 12,000*l.*, the Board have no power to interfere with their decision.—I am, Gentlemen, your obedient servant,

"CHARLES PRESSLY.

"Messrs. Fielden, Brothers."

A true return, and a signed declaration that it was true, were required of him. If he had returned that he had had a profit, it would have been false; and many, he believed, had done so, hoping thereby to escape the more exorbitant assesments of the Commissioners. He had, with his brothers, resolved to make a true return, and they had done so. Now, what he wanted to know was, what evidence should satisfy the Judges or Commissioners in that case? When oaths, and books, and written debtor and creditor accounts of profit and loss were rejected, what was left to be done? What more did they want? And was this to go on? Were his goods to be again seized and sold by the sheriff under this tyrannical law? He had taken the utmost pains to convince the Commissioners his return was correct—had told them that the amounts he showed them were taken from a document signed by himself and his brothers at their annual stock taking, not prepared with any view to meet the Commissioners' eyes, but to determine each partner's share and interest in their joint property at the time, and what the representatives of any one or more, dying before the next stock taking, would be entitled to receive out of the concern. He had taken his oath to the correctness of the return of no profit in the first year, when their assessment was 12,000*l.*; he had offered to show them his books in the second year, to prove that he had no profit, when their assessment was again 12,000*l.*; and, as if to show their daring, and how little they were guided by fact, or calculation, or evidence, they had last year assessed him at just double the amount, that was, 24,000*l.*, and before they had decided the appeal against that assessment they demanded the duty upon it of 700*l.* On the hearing of that appeal the Commissioners present were — John Elliott, Chairman; James Butterworth, Charles Butterworth, Captain Butterworth, also Abraham Briarly, who refused to act. The allowance of the assessment of 24,000*l.*, and the warrant to distrain for the duty on it, were signed by the two former of those gentlemen, Mr. John Elliott and Mr. James Butterworth, on the 12th of December, 1844, and the appeal against the assessment was decided on the 29th of March, 1845. So that the House would see that, pending the appeal, the Commissioners issued their warrant to distrain, and two of the very men who had issued that warrant in December agreed with their brother Commissioners in March following, to reduce the assessment from 24,000*l.* to the former sum of 12,000*l.* Was not this a disgraceful mode of imposing taxes? Was it anything short of a random confiscation? He firmly believed that these assessments were founded upon no belief in the Commissioners' minds that he had made such profits in trade as rendered him assessable, but that they believed he and his brothers were able to pay; and, therefore, prompted by the Government local officials, they made these round assessments. The flourishing revenue so much boasted of was made up in part of the fruits of such barefaced robbery as this of which he had been the victim. He remembered that this tax was wrung from the Government at the end of the war by the public outcry against it. It was then designated the "highwayman's tax;" he believed it had lost none of its atrocious character; and he hoped the next election would teach English Ministers that they must carry on their Government by more moral means than a highwayman's tax. When he mentioned this matter to the House in February last year, the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) said, that the Government had no more control over the matter than any individual Member of that House. In Mr. Pressly's letter, he was now told, that the Board of Stamps and Taxes had no control in the matter. His appeal, then, was to the House; and if the House answered him that it not only had no control, but no will to inquire, let it be known to the public at once, that the maxim of English law, that there is "no wrong without a remedy," is utterly false; and that, under our new law of taxation, the Income Tax Commissioners and the Court of Exchequer together, can assess and rob to any extent and with perfect impunity. He was not in the House when the Income Tax Act was renewed last March, being then confined at home by illness; but he observed, that in the debates of the House, the case of himself and his brothers had been mentioned by the hon. Member for Lambeth and the hon. Member for Finsbury; on which occasion the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) was reported to have said, "that he trusted in the case of the hon. Member for Oldham, the Treasury would be able to afford redress." And the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was reported to have said, on the same occasion, "that he should be happy to point out to him (Mr. Fielden) the mode in which he should proceed to obtain redress." He had, on that intimation, called on the right hon. Gentleman not long since; but the right hon. Gentleman had only advised him to make his return to the officer of Stamps and Taxes, and request that he might be assessed by the Special Commissioners, instead of going before the Commissioners at Rochdale; which, even if he should be fairly dealt with for the future, would be no redress for the past. His oath had been disregarded; and, as he conscientiously regarded the solemnity of an oath, and considered a man unfit to hold a seat in that House who had taken a false oath, he wished for an opportunity of showing that House that he had been grossly wronged by these Commissioners in that respect as well as others. This was a public question. He brought it forward as a public question, believing that in Lancashire the Income Tax had been exacted most unjustly and oppressively from thousands, and, in his own case, he knew it had. If he received no assurance that such wrong should end, he should consider it his duty to bring the matter before the House in one shape or another, and time after time, till he obtained some security for himself and the public. Mr. Fielden concluded by moving for the following Returns:—

"A Return of the total amount of assessments to the Income Tax under schedule D, of the 5th and 6th of Victoria, c. 35, for the township of Todmorden and Walsden, in the county of Lancaster, and in the division of Middleton, for the year commencing April 5, 1842, and ending April 5, 1843, and for the year commencing April 5, 1843, and ending April 5, 1844, and for the year commencing April 5, 1844, and ending April 5, 1845, distinguishing the amount assessed for each of the said several years; and also a return of the total amount received or demanded of those assessed in the said township for each of the said years respectively. Also a return of any correspondence that has taken place between the Board of Stamps and Taxes and Fielden, Brothers, of Todmorden, relative to the assessments and demands made on them under schedule D of the Act 5th and 6th Victoria, chap. 35; also a return of any correspondence that has taken place between Mr. George J. Gibbs, of the Tax Office at Bury, in the county of Lancaster, a surveyor of taxes under the Act 5th and 6th Victoria, chap. 35, and Messrs. Fielden, Brothers, and Mr. John Fielden, of Todmorden, in the said county; also a return of any correspondence between Mr. J. Walker, of Liverpool, receiving inspector under the Act 5th and 6th Victoria, chap. 35, and Fielden, Brothers, of Todmorden, in the county of Lancaster, together with any proposed skeleton form of account for Income Tax supplied by the said J. Walker to Messrs. Fielden; and a return of any correspondence that has taken place between the Commissioners acting within and for the division of Middleton, sitting at Rochdale, in the county of Lancaster, under the Act 5th and 6th Victoria, chap. 35, and the Commissioners of the Board of Stamps and Taxes, relative to the case of Messrs. Fielden, Brothers, of Todmorden, in the said county, under the said Act."

Mr. Williams seconded the Motion, and hoped the Government would not object to the return. He was glad his hon. Friend had brought this case of injustice and oppression before the country; fortunately for him, he was in circumstances to enable him to do so; but he (Mr. Williams) ventured to say there were thousands who had precisely the same complaint to urge, but whose circumstances and credit did not enable them to make public this system, not of oppression only, but of absolute fraud under the law. One of his own constituents had made a statement to him of a similar kind. He and his partners carried on two branches of business, on one of which the profits were nil: on the other the profit was 1,000*l.*; on the whole business, the profit being neutralized by the loss, there could not be said to be any profit at all, and they returned nil; but notwithstanding they were surcharged in 1,000*l.* a year; nor were there any means of obtaining redress. Such a state of things ought not to be allowed to exist. It was not honest; the Act itself did not warrant it, but there was no remedy; the parties who levied the tax were far from the seat of power, and assumed that infallibility always claimed by public officers; and if an appeal was made to a higher power, the answer always was that whatever the subordinate officers did must be right; that they were infallible, and no inquiry ensued. The hon. Member for Oldham ought to have justice done him; that a Gentleman so respected should have his oath doubted for the purpose of taking money out of his pocket, was not to be endured.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the hon. Member for Oldham was quite aware, having some time ago stated his intention of moving for these Papers, that with respect to a majority of them, there was no objection to producing them; but with respect to the correspondence with the Commissioners on the subject, those documents were not of an official character, and it was not in his power to consent to their production. He wished to offer a few observations on the statement which the hon. Member had made to the House; the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Coventry had both stated that there were thousands of similar cases of oppression under this Act, but that individuals were afraid to make complaints on the subject. He must be permitted to express serious doubts on this point; he did not find there was this great unwillingness to complain on the part of persons who felt aggrieved by any tax imposed by Parliament; and he could truly say with respect to such complaints from parties with regard to the Income Tax, the Government was entirely ignorant of them. A still stronger proof that these complaints were not so general, and that there was not this general feeling of hostility to the Income Tax, was found in this fact—the House was called on to renew the Act; and if there had been this universal sense of grievance on the subject, did the hon. Gentleman suppose that those who represented populous manufacturing districts would not have come forward and stated these complaints, or that there would have been that general feeling throughout the country in favour of the renewal of the tax which was displayed at the time? He thought the hon. Gentleman must feel in his own mind that no such universal sense of oppression could have existed, or it could not have produced so little effect on the country. So much with respect to the general question. He now came to the complaint of the hon. Member himself; and he assured the hon. Member nothing could give him more pain than that he should have been subjected to any inconvenience or injury; as far as it was in his power to be of any use to the hon. Gentleman by tendering him any advice as to the course he should adopt, he should have been happy to have given him any counsel by which he might have avoided the difficulty he was placed in. But the hon. Gentleman must be sensible that when the law imposed a tax on the country, and parties to obtain redress of a complaint did not adopt the course the law prescribed, they were themselves responsible for the inconvenience they experienced. The mode in which the Property Tax was directed to be levied was this—Commissioners were appointed, who made assessments according to their view of what parties ought to pay. On this being known, those parties were called on to pay, and if they thought themselves aggrieved, they had two modes of appeal — they might either appeal to the general commissioners of the district, whose decision upon hearing the appeal was final; or, if he preferred another course, he might appeal to the Special Commissioners appointed by the Government, whose decision on the appeal was equally final. Persons might go before the Commissioners of their own district, to whom the power of hearing appeals was given; or to the officers appointed by the Government. Having made that appeal, a party must, of course, abide by the decision, as in every other case of appeal, whether in judicial or other matters. The hon. Gentleman complained of the final decision of this court of appeal, under which a levy was made upon him, which he stated to be monstrous. Why, in any case, upon the decision of the proper tribunal being pronounced, the Court of Exchequer was bound to issue its process for the levy; no imputation could be made on the justice of that Court; it had but complied with the provision of the law, which directed the levy to be issued when the money was pronounced to be due to the Crown. He was quite ready to admit the hardship on the party of the circumstances attending a levy, of his goods being seized and sold by public auction. A statement of such a proceeding was very likely to excite popular feeling; but it should be remembered that the money had been declared due to the Crown, and if the Crown had not the power of enforcing payment of its claims by ordinary process of law, the House might as well save itself the trouble of imposing taxes at all. The taxation could never be levied if the Crown was not able to resort to the law. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think that by the course which had been pursued it was intended to cast a reflection on him, because the doubt of his return on the part of the Commissioners necessarily implied that the statement of the hon. Member was deficient in truth. He did not think such a conclusion was just or fair. The question of what were the profits of trade was one always liable to doubt, and admitting of dispute. The Act laid down certain rules by which the amount of profits should be assessed; a person without any imputation on his truth or honour, might make a return under a false idea of what was correct, which might be disputed by the Commissioners. He was the last man in the world to cast an imputation on the veracity and honour of the hon. Gentleman, and he had no doubt the Commissioners felt the same. But as persons placed in a public situation, and bound by their duty to ascertain that the return made was made according to law, if they had erred, if the General Commissioners had erred, if the Special Commissioners had erred, it was a matter of extreme regret; but the Court of Appeal to which Parliament had trusted the authority, and to which the hon. Gentleman had chosen to apply, was not empowered to give any relief. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had no means of communicating with those Commissioners; he had received no complaints from other parties; and as far as he was able to judge from extrinsic inquiries, in order to ascertain the mode of proceeding, he was apprehensive the hon. Member for Oldham had not complied with the necessary conditions. The Commissioners did not receive from him the answers and explanations required; they wanted further information, and the hon. Gentleman distinctly refused to give the information they wanted, but offered information of a totally different character. He was very much afraid that owing to that circumstance more than any other, if injustice had been done the hon. Gentleman, he must attribute it to himself. The hon. Gentleman had said, that on a former occasion he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had stated there was a mode by which redress might be obtained, and that he would apply to him to say what course he ought to adopt. To this he would reply, if the hon. Gentleman thought the general Commissioners prejudiced against him, he should have applied to the Special Commissioners, who were independent of the district, and could have no local bias whatever as to the merits of this particular case. He deeply regretted that the advice tendered to the hon. Gentleman two years ago was not adopted till this present year. As far as he had been able to obtain information, the main point of difference between the hon. Gentleman and the Commissioners arose upon the mode in which stock ought to be valued. The question was, whether cotton that had been purchased some years before at a higher price than it then bore in the market, and manufactured into articles, was to be taken at the loss caused by the difference between the price of that cotton when it was purchased and that which it bore in the market at the time the assessment was made. He was speaking more upon common report than any official information; but the case went before the proper tribunal; the hon. Gentleman declined to give the information wished for, and it came to a decision adverse to him. The question was this—supposing cotton to be purchased in 1838 at 7*d.* per lb. and made into goods in 1842, whether the difference between the prices at those two periods was to be taken as loss? From the jealousy on the part of the House of an interference on the part of the Government in private affairs, it made the Commissioners the Court of Appeal. The case in question was brought before that court. The persons who had a duty imposed on them for the public benefit called for further information, which was necessary to enable them to make up their minds on the subject; the hon. Gentleman refused to give it, and he did not know how those gentlemen were to act otherwise than by deciding against the party refusing to give that information. If anything had occurred painful to the hon. Gentleman's feelings, or anything which he thought not consistent with perfect equity, he, for one, could not see that any blame attached to the parties. The difficulty would not have arisen if he had shown a little less of that British virtue which led him to resist with more than ordinary firmness what he considered an improper intrusion on his private affairs. He understood the hon. Gentleman had at last appealed to the Special Commissioners, who were quite free from prejudice; and even should their decision be unfavourable to him, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not be disposed to resist it.

Mr. Fielden, in explanation, said, if the right hon. Gentleman had spoken from information as to what had taken place, he must tell himit w as incorrect. He had answered any question put to him, he had given all the information he could, he had offered his books for examination; but the first intimation he had of the decision was the levy made on his goods. If the right hon. Gentleman would allow him to meet the Commissioners face to face, or give him a Committee, if he did not make out a case for inquiry satisfactory to every reasonable man, he would give up the question.

Mr. Hawes hoped the discouragement the Chancellor of the Exchequer had attempted to cast on the "British virtue" of offering a decided opposition to an arbitrary measure, would not prevent any person who felt injured by the Income Tax from stating his case, and offering it all the opposition in his power. He had always opposed the tax; he thought it a dangerous basis for a large amount of taxation—one founded on a most unjust principle, which could not be carried out into practice without causing complaints. The right hon. Gentleman said, there was not much public opposition to it when imposed; but he left out of consideration the fact that when it was proposed, it was accompanied by certain other offers. He knew the value of the admission; those offers were accepted by certain great interests; they took the Income Tax and accepted the repeal of duties on the importation of certain raw materials. A bargain was struck; large and important interests accepted the Income Tax; he did not; many others did not. The only point the right hon. Gentleman had made in reply to the hon. Member for Oldham was, that he ought to have appealed to the Special Commissioners; the hon. Member had so appealed, and he did not believe they would do anything but confirm the decision come to by the other Commissioners. They had ample power to act on any appeal brought before them; but this House could not call them to account. If it could, the facts the inquiry would elicit, would oblige them to give up the tax. The course the Commissioners had taken had inflicted great hardship on the hon. Gentleman, and at last it seemed that they altered the assessment from 24,000*l.* to 12,000*l.* without stating any reason for such a monstrous reduction. The hon. Gentleman refused to return any profit, and offered to produce the balance-sheet of the concern, by which the profits were divided between his partners and himself. They assessed him at 24,000*l.* a year, and then, at their own will and pleasure, reduced it to 12,000*l.* That he thought a case for inquiry. What ground had they for giving up 12,000*l.* a year? If the assessment of 24,000*l.* was right, they were bound to adhere to it. He admitted the right hon. Gentleman was always ready to give advice, but he could do nothing to give any relief. They were bound by the Act of Parliament, giving the most arbitrary powers of interfering with the profits of trade. The right hon. Gentleman said, the difference arose as to the mode in which the profits of trade should be computed. That difference would exist in every concern in the kingdom. In all cases it was difficult to say what should be carried to the account as profit. All the hon. Member said, was, that his loss should be deducted from the profit, and if they did not allow this, the Act was more iniquitous than he thought it was. They were bound to take the Act itself into consideration; it gave private individuals an arbitrary power, and it required many Amendments. The Boards of Commissioners ought to be constituted in a different manner; it never could be endured that individuals should sit in judgment on the pecuniary affairs of their neighbours. Let the power be given to some known and responsible authority. His hon. Friend did not care whether his affairs were made public or not; but others had not the same credit. His hon. Friend offered his books for inspection: why did not the Commissioners examine them? They refused to ascertain from his books what his profits were; they refused to take the balance-sheet which settled the amount of profits between the parties; it was an unquestionable document, and they were bound to receive it. If his hon. Friend was wrong, the public had a right to the tax on 12,000*l.* more. The hon. gentleman's case had been thought important enough to be introduced by a recent writer on political economy into his work, as an illustration of his argument on this system of taxation. It was a case of deep, individual, and public interest, and it had received no answer, except a general sermon on the necessity of obeying the law, and a sneer at what the right hon. Gentleman called British virtue.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he had not entered into the details of what passed before the Commissioners. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had no more power to call for particular returns from the Commissioners than the hon. Gentleman himself.

Mr. Hawes said, the objection to giving publicity to private affairs did not apply in cases where the party himself stated that he did not care about it.

Mr. Bernal had understood the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer on a former occasion to state that some mode of relief would be afforded the hon. Member. He did not complain of any breach of promise; but that was the impression left on his mind by that discussion. The hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Hume) at the time the tax was proposed had foreseen this difficulty, and proposed a clause giving some department of the Government a jurisdiction in such cases. At present there were two courts of appeal—the local Board and the Board at Somerset House. His hon. Friend had appealed to the local Board; he might have been to blame in doing that, when it was composed of persons among whom he had taken a very decided part in politics. If they wished to diminish the unpopularity of the tax, they must take some means of meeting such cases. The measure was hurried through the House; the clause proposed by his hon. Friend (Mr. Hume) was rejected, all Amendments were disregarded, and now it was highly necessary the Act should be reconsidered. They would have an opportunity of doing so during the recess, and he hoped the Government would avail themselves of it. They should appoint some permanent Board with power to do something to mitigate such evils as those stated in the case of which the hon. Member for Oldham had so properly and justly complained.

Mr. Hume was glad the case had been brought forward; he was an advocate of direct taxation, but he wished it to be levied with as little trouble to the subject as possible. When the Bill was before the House he pointed out the anomaly of giving the power to levy a taxation of 4,000,000*l.* or 5,000,000*l.* to persons who were not responsible either to the House of Commons or to the Government, and whom they would have doing as they pleased. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer said the Government had no power; there was an evil done, and there was no remedy. He implored the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) to correct the evil; in another Session there would be time to do it. He had formerly objected to the manner in which the Land Tax Commissioners were appointed; they were recommended by the county Members, and were appointed from political reasons. The constitution of the Income Tax Commissioners was also subject to great inconvenience; they elected the superior Commissioners; he asked the Government to take away this power, and make them responsible to the House. Under the representation that the Act must be passed as a whole, and that it was only for a short time, the Government rejected every Amendment, and did everything in their power to make the tax not only unpopular, but unjust. When the grossest cases of oppression occurred in the Tower Hamlets ward, and when they were complained of, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he could not help it. But it was the Government who made the law; the Government were the parties to blame for the evils, and they ought to correct them. In the case of the hon. Member for Oldham, the Commissioners appeared to have acted with the extreme of rigour, and in a manner which could only be explained by the existence of some political grudge against him. But he hoped this discussion would be the means of effecting some modification.

Sir R. Peel said, when the Income Tax was under consideration in 1842, of course the question arose who should be the parties entrusted with certain powers under the Act. The question appeared to resolve itself into one or other of two alternatives—either that the Government should have these powers, or that parties themselves interested in the just administration of the law should exercise them. As there was great jealousy of the Executive Government having a right to inquire into the affairs of individuals, which would give it a great influence, Parliament determined to act on the presumption that this power might be abused, and therefore thought it better to adhere to the principle of the former law, and gave the power of inspecting private affairs to private individuals. On the whole, Parliament affirmed that principle. Under what circumstances did the Government select the Land Tax Commissioners for the purpose of the Income Tax Act? Why, two years before, the Act appointing those Commissioners had been by the late Government renewed and altered. The present Government were asked to make a new selection of Commissioners for the purposes of the Income Tax Act, but they thought it much better to adhere to the Act as it stood, and so preclude the possibility of any suspicion as to their motives. He was ready to admit that it was objectionable that the private affairs of individuals should be made known to others who might be their rivals in trade; but in order to meet that objection, the Special Commissioners had been appointed, before whom persons could go who did not wish to go before the regular Commissioners. If the hon. Member had really reason to believe that the Commissioners were actuated by personal motives, he could have gone before the Special Commissioners, and so have avoided altogether the interference of his neighbours or of his political opponents. It would cause him very great regret to find that the hon. Member for Oldham had any just cause to complain of the operation of the Act; but at the same time he must observe that, considering the large amount that had been collected under the tax, the proportion of complaints had been much less than could have been expected.

Mr. Brotherton complained of the manner in which the Land Tax Commissioners were nominated. As it was, if a borough Member wished to nominate one, he could not do so without the consent of the county Member, and with him he had no chance if he was of different politics. With respect to the case before the House, the reason why the firm returned "no profits," was, that their humanity would not allow them to stop their works, and the consequence was that there was a vast accumulation of stock. They had had no less than 600,000 pieces of cloth on hand which were unsaleable.

Captain Pechell hoped the Government would take into consideration the cases of those persons having incomes under 150*l*, a year, who had been surcharged, but who had never had the excess returned to them.

Mr. Fielden said, he had no wish to divide the House, but he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would grant him the correspondence between the Commissioners of the Court of Appeal and the Board of Stamps and Taxes.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the correspondence was extra-official, and he could not produce it.

The other Returns were then ordered.

ACCIDENTS ON RAILWAYS.] On the Question being again put,

Mr. Bernal wished to call the attention of the Government to a subject of considerable importance. They were aware through the newspapers that accidents had occurred lately on two or three of the leading railroads. Of course, there were casualties of the kind which were altogether beyond human control; but it did appear, that in the case of the accident on the South Eastern Railway there had been a want of care. A respectable surgeon, who was a passenger, and who attended on some of the unfortunate sufferers, expressly impugned the care and discretion of those managing the railway, in putting an engine behind the train. There had also been an accident to the mail train of the Birmingham Railway, where there had not been a sacrifice of human life, but certainly a great deal of injury to the limbs of the passengers. He was not able to suggest a mode by which these things could be checked, but at the same he thought that some good might be done by calling the attention of the right hon. Baronet to the subject. The punishment of an engine-driver, or of a light-bearer, did not appear to him to be enough. The attention of those gentlemen who obtained profit from the railways should also be drawn to the subject. He had read a letter from a surgeon in one of the papers, which contained a statement perfectly horrifying. It was there stated, that when the South Eastern train arrived at the terminus, it was detained for some minutes by the check takers to take the tickets, although there were persons in the train who were suffering from the most grievous contusions. These accidents were now beginning to happen to all; and unless there was some interference, he feared that they would have to record some much more fearful contingencies.

Sir G. Clerk said, whenever such accidents occurred, it was the practice of the Board of Trade to despatch an engineer officer to the spot to ascertain the cause of them. The companies were also bound to report them within a certain time after they occurred. He expected that in the course of the day the Board of Trade would receive the report of the engineer sent to inquire into the accident on the South Eastern line. He must at the same time observe, that although the Board of Trade generally found that any suggestions they made were attended to by the Companies, yet they had no power whatever to enforce compliance. It might, certainly, be hereafter necessary to impose some more efficient check on the railway companies for the prevention of accidents.

Mr. Clive hoped some arrangement of the kind would be made. He was himself suffering severely from the effects of the great carelessness of those who conducted the railway on the occasion of one of the accidents that had been mentioned.

Mr. P. Howard said, that the rarity of accidents on the Brussels and Antwerp Railway proved how useful was an efficient system of superintendence.

Sir R. Peel: Sir, I am not sorry that the hon. Member has called the attention of the House to this subject, because as the law at present stands, there are no means of reaching those by whom these accidents are caused; and if the moral responsibility which now rests on those who have the management of railways is not sufficient, it will be necessary for Parliament to insist on some different system. It is continually urged that the accidents by railways bear no proportion whatever to those which used to occur by stage coach. That is no answer—it is a mere sophistication. We have a right to be insured that those who derive the profits from these railways, shall take every possible precaution on behalf of the public. Every precaution that money can command ought to be taken; and there can be nothing worse than that the public mind should be disturbed by the constant fear of these accidents. It is unfortunate for the railways themselves that the growing public confidence in them should be destroyed. It does seem, that in these recent cases the accidents which have occurred, might have been prevented by due precaution. If by the employment of ill-qualified subordinate officers, these accidents are rendered more likely to happen, or more frequent, then it will be the duty of Parliament to step in and demand a reduction of the profits of those who are concerned in the railway, in order that due precautions may be taken to insure the public safety.

Viscount Palmerston said: I wish to say a few words in reference to the subject of accidents on railways. As a matter of public duty, I think it right to say that this case of carelessness, if it be one, on the Dover Railway, is not the first instance of bad management on that particular line. I happened to come from Dover to London in November last; and, as I was in my own carriage at the end of the train, with my back turned to the engine, I had a complete view of what passed. During the greater part of the journey, and especially in passing through the tunnels, the train was not only drawn by an engine in front, but propelled by one at the back; and if any stoppage had occurred, the back engine must inevitably have gone through the train. The passengers, when they got out at the station, were totally unaware of this hindermost engine having been used. On inquiry I was informed that, from a desire of economy, a set of engines were employed by the Company which were not strong enough singly to do the work, and that two engines therefore were used, where one would otherwise have been sufficient.

Subject at an end.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.] Mr. Hume wished to make a suggestion to the right hon. Baronet as to the arrangement of the business of the House for the next Session of Parliament. The Government had this year taken, of late, both Tuesday and Thursday for themselves; and the consequence was, that there were now so many Motions to be made that they could not get on with Supply. The great object of these arrangements should be, to ascertain with as much certainly as possible when particular business would come on; but the effect of the present system was to create great uncertainty, and yet not to advance the public business. What he would suggest was, that next Session, Tuesdays and Thursdays should be appropriated to Motions, and Monday and Friday to Supply and the Government business. He also proposed that on Wednesdays the House should always meet at twelve o'clock, and proceed with Orders of the Day, sitting till six o'clock, after which Members would be set at liberty for the evening. He proposed also that no Committees on Private Bills should sit on Wednesdays.

Sir R. Peel reminded the House that this Session had been a peculiar one, owing to the great press of private business. Government had introduced their financial measures at the earliest period; as well as all others, the Irish measures particularly, which were likely to meet with opposition. Therefore they had done their utmost to expedite the public business. On one measure alone—the Maynooth Bill—there had been eleven nights' debate before the second reading. With respect to next Session, he would be ready to support the hon. Member's proposition to meet early on Wednesday, and sit till six or half-past six o'clock. That would be much better than sitting for five continuous nights, the fatigue of which was too much for any strength. It was not possible for those who attended that House for fourteen hours a day duly to discharge their duty to the public, it was utterly impossible for those who had also official responsibilities. With respect to the Government having taken Thursday for their business, he doubted much whether they had gained anything by it; but in doing so, they had only followed the precedent of several Sessions both under the present and the late Government. That arrangement would not have been made if it had been seriously objected to, nor would it ever be pressed against the wish of the House. He hoped that for the rest of the Session they would be allowed to proceed with the public business, and that Members who had Motions would exercise that forbearance which would allow of the Session being brought as soon as possible to a close.

Mr. Hawes hoped that the sittings on Wednesdays would be really attended for the purpose of public business, and that the Members of the Government would attend. He begged, however, to say, that no imputation whatever rested on the Members of the Government as regarded the regularity of their attendance during the present Session. With respect to the appropriation of Thursdays, he would suggest that it should be a Government day after the 1st of July. In that case, Members would not put their Notices on the Paper after that day.

Mr. Bernal hoped the right hon. Baronet did not suppose that the Session of 1846 would be less distinguished by the pressure of railway business than that of 1845. He thought it deserved the serious attention of the right hon. Baronet, whether it were likely that they would be able to obtain in successive Sessions the attendance of Members on Railway Committees, and whether they would not be compelled to adopt some other system.

Sir R. Peel begged to remind the hon. Member what had been the result of the attempt to transfer the railway business to a Government tribunal. He was convinced that if that House parted with the power of adjudication, they would never be satisfied with the decisions of another tribunal, and that there would be still a struggle on the third reading. If it went forth to the public that the House of Lords had discharged their duty, while the House of Commons had shrunk from theirs, their position in the country would be altered, and they would feel compelled to step in at the third reading of Bills, in order that they might retain their position in the Constitution.

Mr. Aglionby congratulated the House on the assent given by the right hon. Baronet to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Montrose to meet early and rise early on Wednesdays. He could not omit the opportunity of paying his tribute to Her Majesty's Government for their regular attendance in that House. Not even the most assiduous Member of the House had surpassed them in the attention they had devoted to the public business.

Mr. C. Buller could not refrain from expressing his opinion that the present system of conducting the railway business of that House was the most defective and mischievous that had ever been devised, from the expense to which parties were put, and the uncertainty that attended the decisions of different Committees. It was a scandal to the Legislature of the country. The right hon. Baronet said that they had tried the experiment of a Government Board. But that Board had only a partial field of inquiry, it did not embrace the whole subject. He thought they would be ultimately compelled to transfer the decision on these Railway Bills to a wholly independent tribunal.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that this was a subject which would depend next Session on a great many points and difficulties which could not be considered now. He hoped hon. Members would now let the public business proceed.

Mr. W. Williams complained that the Government had introduced eleven Bills within only a few weeks of the close of the Session, and when it was impossible that they could be duly considered.

Subject at an end.

National Defences.] Viscount Palmerston said: My principal object in rising, is to call the attention of the House to a matter of great national importance, directly connected with the business upon which we are about to enter—I mean that of the Committee of Supply; it is the great imperfection of the present state of our national means of defence. I repeat, that this is a subject of the utmost importance. I think that any man who values peace, and who is sensible of the advantages which the country derives from it, must feel that this is a matter of first-rate importance; for peace between two countries can never be secure except when they stand upon a footing of equality with regard to their respective means of self-defence. Now, Sir, France, as I had occasion to state on a former occasion, has now a standing army of 340,000 men, fully equipped, including a large force of cavalry and artillery, and, in addition to that, 1,000,000 of the National Guard. I know that the National Guard of Paris amounts to 80,000 men, trained, disciplined, reviewed, clothed, equipped, and accustomed to duty, and perfectly competent, therefore, to take the internal duty of the country, and to set free the whole of the regular force. Now, Sir, if France were a country separated from our own by an impassable barrier—if she had no navy, or if the Channel could not be crossed, I should say this was a matter with which we had no concern. But that is not the case. In the first place, France has a fleet equal to ours. I do not speak of the number of vessels actually in existence, but of the fleet in commission and half-commission, in both which respects the fleet of France is equal to that of this country. But, again, the Channel is no longer a barrier. Steam navigation has rendered that which was before impassable by a military force nothing more than a river passable by a steam bridge. France has steamers capable of transporting 30,000 men, and she has harbours, inaccessible to any attack, in which these steamers may collect, and around which, on the land side, large bodies of men are constantly quartered. These harbours are directly opposite to our coast, and within a few hours' voyage of the different landing-places on the coast of England. Well, then, I say, that is not a state of things under which you can remain secure of peace, unless you are in a state of preparation to meet any sudden attack. Sir, I shall be told, perhaps, that our relations with France are of the most amicable nature. I admit it, and I trust that they may so continue. But questions of the greatest importance may start up in any quarter of the globe, and we can never be sure from month to month, with respect to two countries which have such extensive and diversified interests to be considered, that questions of the utmost delicacy and difficulty will not unexpectedly arise. Therefore, I say, when those questions do arise, you cannot deal with them on a footing of equality, and in a manner consistent with the interest and dignity of the country, if you are not in such a state as to be at least inaccessible to any sudden or early attack. Now, I say we are not in such a state. On a former occasion I pointed out the deficient state for defence of our naval arsenals. The right hon. Baronet told me that measures were being taken to remedy that deficiency. I hope that the remedy will be effectual. I feel sure that a very small addition to the batteries and so forth will be sufficient; and if a Commission of scientific and able officers be appointed to take the matter into consideration, I have no doubt that in a short time all ground of complaint will be removed. I dwelt also on the necessity of having harbours of refuge. The right hon. Baronet stated that that subject was also under the consideration of the Government, and that a Vote would be proposed. The sum now assigned for this purpose is a very small one, but it is probably enough as a beginning. The amount proposed is upwards of 120,000*l.*, the estimate being 3,500,000*l.* I am willing to think that the Government will take such measures as they deem necessary; still I must say that they do not go far enough. I will suppose that our dockyards are perfectly inaccessible. I will suppose that we have harbours fortified against attack as well as against the sea, in which our steam vessels —assuming that we have a sufficient number of them—might be kept ready to act against any sudden invasion. But you must recollect that Calais, St. Malo, Cherbourg, and Dunkirk, are within a few hours' passage of our coast; and that, supposing a rupture to occur between the two countries, which I hope will not be case, you would have very short notice of any meditated attack; you would have very little means of sending your steamers in sufficient numbers to prevent a landing; and, therefore, though not for the purpose of attacking your dockyards, still for that of invading your coast, you might have 20,000 or 30,000 men landed without any possibility of your preventing such an event. Well, then, what is the state of the internal garrison which you can rely upon, supposing such an unfortunate event to happen? Why, you have nothing but the regular force of this country, which amounts, probably, including that in the Channel Islands, to less than 50,000 men,—20,000 in Ireland, and the rest distributed over Great Britain; and this force must be brigaded, a staff must be appointed, and the cavalry and artillery must be all brought together before you could put into the field a force capable of opposing an enemy. I would ask the Government what time must necessarily elapse before that could be done? You would have to recruit your army, and to ballot for the militia; and I ask any man who understands these matters, in what condition you would be placed in case of a rupture with any Foreign Power? The time and expense required for recruiting and collecting the army, would be more than any man who has not turned his attention to these things could possibly imagine. Well, then, I say, you have an acknowledged, established, and constitutional mode of guarding against this state of things, which of late has been abandoned on account of the expense, but for the continued abandonment of which I hold that that reason does not any longer apply, while other reasons for resorting to it have greatly augmented within the last few years. I refer to the summoning of the regular militia. When I asked the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department the other day, whether it was intended to ballot for the militia, he told me that it was not; and it is on this account that I feel it my duty, before going into Committee of Supply at the end of this Session, and, before it is too late for the Government to take the matter into consideration, to urge upon the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government the great importance of organizing this portion of the military defence. There is no constitutional objection to it; and for a comparatively small sum, you get the power of adding to your home garrison in an infinitely greater degree than you could by laying out that sum of money in augmenting the regular regiments. I would wish the Government to consider the expediency of not allowing this autumn to pass over without ballotting for and enrolling the militia. I would urge them in the course of the next summer to give at least half, if not the whole, of the militia regiments their twenty-eight days' training. What is the expense? I look back to the estimates of former years, and I see that the expense of a ballot for the militia of Great Britain, which gave 50,000 men was, not more than about 40,000*l.* [The Chancellor of the Exchequer: The local expenses?] The expense to the public was about 40,000*l.* The estimate for training the militia of Great Britain in 1821 was 90,000*l.*; that was the whole expense connected with 50,000 men. I do not mean to say that these are not considerable sums; and no doubt, if there were a deficiency in the revenue it would be a balance of considerations whether you would incur this expense, or take your chance of two or three years' continuance of peace; but then we have a war tax in time of peace; and, that being the case, for Heaven's sake let us have those ordinary precautions which will save us from the necessity of incurring the greater expenses of actual war. For a comparatively small amount you might have the means of assembling in arms within a fortnight 50,000 men as the organized British militia, and 70,000, if, in addition to that number, you organized the militia in Ireland. A training of twenty-eight days annually would place that force in a state of efficiency, sufficient, probably, for all the duties which they might suddenly be called upon to perform; and if you chose at the end of the third year to give them fourteen days more, you would have a force which would be amply sufficient for the national defence. And do not let hon. Gentlemen imagine that the existence of a force of that sort, or the knowledge on the part of Foreign Powers that through the existence of such a force you were in a condition to defend your shores against attack, would not be a most powerful means of preserving you from difficulties which might ultimately lead to war. I venture to state that no country in Europe is in such a state of defencelessness as England is at the present moment. I know Governments are very apt to think—and the present one is perhaps not less so than any former one—that the duty of Ministers of the Crown is first of all to obtain and to retain a majority in this House. That is quite true; for without a majority in this House they could not continue to be Ministers. But that is not enough. It is not enough to be able to struggle through the debate and to scramble through the attack; it is not enongh to bring in good measures—and some of the measures of the Government this year I admit to have been good;—it is not enough to act on the best and soundest principles of domestic legislation, if you do not, in addition to that, place the country in as perfect a state of security as you possibly can; for if your shores are not sufficiently protected all your legislation may be in vain. Well, then, I say that this country is in the most defenceless state, considered with reference to the means of attack possessed by other Powers; on the one hand, the country is in the most defenceless condition in which she has ever yet been left: on the other hand, there never was a period at which your resources, population, and wealth were so great, and at which you had equal means, with less pressure on the industry and resources of the country, of placing yourself in a situation of comparative security. I contend, therefore, that it is the duty of the Government to look seriously at these matters. Sir, the old maxim, "Si vis pacem para bellum," is both true and false. It is a false maxim if it mean that you ought, in time of peace, to prepare a sufficient force for aggressive hostility. Such a course of proceeding is doubly mischievous. In the first place, it excites unnecessary jealousy on the part of foreign countries, and leads them to engage in preparations which may tend to render the preservation of peace uncertain. But, moreover, that Power which, in time of peace, arms itself with a view to aggressive movements, naturally acquires a disposition to make use of the means so attained; and thus what has been done begets a feeling which is inimical to peace. But if the maxim refers only to the preparation in peace of the means of defence in case of war, it is a most legitimate and sound maxim. It is by that means alone that any country can secure to itself the continuance of the blessings of peace. I hold that we have not at present that state of military preparation which would enable us to look with indifference upon any sudden contingencies. I hold that it is in the power of the Government to secure the necessary means of defence—at least to a very considerable degree—at a comparatively small expense, and without any infringement of those constitutional principles which I for one have not the least wish to disregard. Sir, it is upon these grounds that I have thought it my duty to call the attention of the Government to this subject. I would entreat them to consider whether it be consistent with that responsibility which weighs upon them, not merely to govern this country well, but to defend also that country which they so govern, to refrain from resorting to those constitutional methods of defence which may be so easily adopted, and which, in time of war, would add so greatly to our means of national defence.

Sir R. Peel said: Sir, I feel all the difficulty under which any person placed in my situation must labour in discussing publicly the question to which the noble Lord has felt it his duty to call our attention. I totally differ from the noble Lord as to the defenceless position of this country. I think I could prove that the noble Lord's impression on that subject is altogether erroneous; but I am quite sure that I should not be acting consistently with sound discretion, if I were to state the facts upon which my own opinion is founded. Nothing could be so unwise as to encourage parties—a small minority I trust—in other countries who may be bent on hostility to ours. I should be very sorry to furnish them with instruments to be used against their own Government, and thus to prevent that Government, though sincerely desirous of maintaining peace, from securing that object on account of the clamour of a certain portion of the community. I must say, generally, however, that the noble Lord has greatly underrated the power which this country would possess, in the event of hostilities, for the vindication of its honour. So far from concurring in the opinion of the noble Lord, I believe that in case there should be a necessity imposed on this country of resorting to hostilities, there never was a period when such a demonstration as would then be called forth has been made; the Sovereign, supported and encouraged by almost the unanimous voice of the people, being determined in a just cause to make efforts worthy of the ancient character of this country. I have a strong opinion, that upon that head, we have nothing to fear. I think it is hardly possible to estimate what will be seen to be the dormant energy of this country, if a just cause should call it forth. At the same time, I must say that I concur in some of the principles which have been expressed by the noble Lord. I think it would be most unwise in this country to trust altogether to present appearances; and I hold that it is most advisable that this country should be able to feel confident, that in the event of sudden hostilities, she would be strong enough, and has the means, to protect herself. I quite agree with the noble Lord, that on the sudden occurrence of hostilities, as, for example, in the year 1793, unless you are in a state of preparation, the cost of sudden exertion is immense; and that it is a most unwise economy which would leave you to make sudden, precipitate, and unlooked-for efforts, in order to secure your own safety. I think also, with the noble Lord, that this country ought to be in such a state, that any other Power may not, on that account, be encouraged to resort to hostilities for the purpose of obtaining advantages. I trust, indeed, that we shall be able to preserve the friendly relations which exist between this country and France; this I hope will be the case, both for the sake of England and France, and for the sake of the civilized world. So far are this country and the House of Commons from grudging the prosperity of France, that I am sure I speak the general feeling when I say that we saw the returns respecting the commerce of France with great satisfaction. I wish that more intimate commercial relations may be established between the two countries; but I do trust also that whilst France is increasing in her commerce, she will see that she owes that increase of prosperity to the maintenance of peace, and that there will be among all rational people in that country a deliberate opinion that the honour and interests of France may be much better maintained by cultivating industry, and promoting commercial prosperity, than they could be by seeking that which is perfectly unnecessary for that most gallant country, whose reputation stands so high at every period of her history, namely, the maintenance of her glory by the increase of her territorial possessions. But, Sir, I must own that I am rather surprised at the noble Lord's excessive apprehensions on this subject; because the noble Lord was in office for a period of ten years, and I venture to say that this country is in a better state with respect to the means of repelling aggression than she was at that time. Did the noble Lord see France expend the sum of fifteen millions sterling upon the fortifications of Paris, and issue an order increasing the army suddenly to the extent of 100,000 men; and does the noble Lord think that this country now stands in the same position with respect to France as it did in 1841? There was no militia ballot at that period; there was not near the same amount of military force that there is at present; and I very much doubt whether there were as many sail of the line. The noble Lord has, I admit, suggested many points deserving of serious consideration. It is impossible not to see what a change has taken place with respect to navigation. I think that this country has a perfect right to consult its own security. If it were proposed to increase the military or naval force of the country for the purpose of aggression, we ought most seriously to consider the policy of such a course; but, as to taking measures for our own security in the event of public hostilities, the last consideration which should present itself to the mind of a Minister of the Crown is, "What will other Powers think?" I should certainly not hesitate to propose to Parliament, without reference to any other Powers, what I considered necessary even for contingencies. With reference to the dockyards, let me ask what was the state in which we found them? The noble Lord does not tell us that years passed without any measures of improvement being adopted. The improvements which are even now going forward make it desirable that we should not be hurried on to the adoption of measures, lest the money which we expend should be entirely thrown away. We have a perfect right, however, to take precautions for the defence of the naval arsenals and dockyards of this country. For the Navy and Ordnance we proposed this year an addition of 1,100,000*l.* in the Estimates. I am placed, with respect to this matter, between two fires. Every word that I say in one direction may induce other parties to exclaim, "See what the Minister said in the House of Commons; we must now have two or three millions more." I should be exceedingly sorry to see a race run between great Powers—not a race in commerce and civilization—but each increasing as far as possible its military and naval force. There must be a limit to that. It is a question of the nicest discretion, whether you shall propose large sums for the Army or the Navy, or whether the effect will be to add to your relative strength. I know not a nicer question with regard to economy and to every other public object, than the extent to which you will proceed. I hope, however, that this country will never depart from that policy which has secured its safety, namely, that of being strong as a naval Power, and at the same time not attempting to enter into competition with the great military Powers of Europe. Say what you will, this country would not be satisfied with the existence of a standing army of 100,000 or 200,000 men kept within our own land. I admit that the amount of military force is not sufficient now to enable you, consistently with due economy, to meet the demands which may arise; but with respect to our becoming a great military Power, and relying upon having a military force able at once to meet that of other countries, except for the purposes of our own defence, that is a competition into which I trust this country will never enter. I do hope that this country will always have such a degree of naval strength as will enable her to feel entire confidence, in the event of hostilities. Then, with regard to the subject of local militia, let me say that I apprehend we have a demand, in case of necessity, upon a body of disciplined men amounting to 50,000, in whom we might repose great confidence. I refer to the Chelsea pensioners. When I was Secretary of State twenty years since, I even then felt that the militia was in an unsatisfactory state, and that there ought to be some local force constituted in this country. The noble Lord is aware that under the Act there is no prohibition against proceeding to ballot for the militia. The Act suspends the obligation to ballot, which would otherwise be imposed on the Crown; but, in case of necessity, the Crown would still be able to resort to this force. I would observe, that there has been that change in the state of society within the last few years which would probably render the present militia laws not exactly so suitable as they were, and they might perhaps undergo useful alterations. It is not necessary, perhaps, that I should now enter into any further explanation on this subject which the noble Lord has introduced. I am bound to content myself with stating that his impression as to the defencelessness of this country is totally at variance with my own. I speak not of that which concerns the public spirit and the honour of Englishmen, for I am sure that the noble Lord will admit, that with whatever difficulties an appeal to the country might be attended, that appeal would be entirely successful. Whatever may be required for the public service will be asked for, without scruple, by Her Majesty's Government. I am sure the House will feel the necessity of placing this country at all times in such a state of security that it will not have to depend upon temporary and possibly delusive appearances of tranquillity; but there will be actual peace, without any anxiety as to the result of the immediate occurrence of hostilities. The noble Lord said that we have fortunately a large surplus. But who is to be thanked for that? We have a large surplus in consequence of that imposition of taxation which, besides giving us this surplus, enables us to take precautions for the security of the country, and to remit that part of our taxation which has appeared to us to press most upon the labour and industry of the community. Having a surplus, we feel that we cannot apply it better than by taking precautions against eventual and possible danger; and the increase of the Votes for the Navy and Ordnance, and the Vote proposed with respect to the harbours of refuge, show that, while we attend to the claims of the people to the remission of taxation, we have not neglected the precautions which we think necessary for the safety of the country. With respect to the harbours of refuge, this is the first year that any proposal has been made. The Vote is purposely small, and I hope we shall not be driven forward too fast. Nothing can be more important than that we should take the best opinions as to the proper mode of securing the object. I take it for granted that the House is satisfied of the necessity which exists for those harbours of refuge which repeated naval commissions have recommended. The subject has undergone such full investigation that there can be no necessity for any further inquiry. Dover, Portland, and Harwich are the sites which, as the result of repeated inquiries, are pointed out as the most appropriate for harbours of refuge. We have felt it our duty with respect to each of those places to take the opinions of the most eminent civil and military engineers as to the best mode of insuring to the country the greatest permanent advantage as the result of the money expended. With respect to all these places, and especially Dover, it is of the utmost importance that we should have the opportunity of profiting as far as possible by the opinions of those who are best qualified to give advice on the subject. These various matters are occupying the serious attention of the Government; and if my answer to the noble Lord be not entirely satisfactory, I entreat the House to bear in mind that I stand in a position in which I must appeal to their confidence; because I cannot state the particular facts upon which my own impression, as opposed to that of the noble Lord, is founded.

Viscount Palmerston said, the right hon. Baronet seemed to imagine that he advocated a great increase of the regular army, and a rivalry with continental nations. He had distinctly disclaimed any such view; all that he had recommended was the training of the militia. In reference to steam navigation, what he had said was, that the progress which had been made had converted the ordinary means of transport into a steam bridge. He did not mean to impeach the energy of the country, should danger arise. What he meant was, that without previous organization, the bravest men would be of no avail against an armed force.

Sir R. Peel said, the noble Lord appeared to retain the impression that our means of defence were rather abated by the discoveries of steam navigation. He was not at all prepared to admit that. He thought that the demonstration which we could make of our steam navy was one which would surprise the world; and, as the noble Lord had spoken of steam bridges, he would remind him that there were two parties who could play at making them.

Sir C. Napier said, that they had at present at sea eight sail of the line; but they, in point of seamen, were two rates below their proper complement. It was only the other day that the gallant Admiral opposite found it necessary to increase the number of men in those ships, and he could not have adopted a wiser measure. The Secretary at War had stated the other night, that no difficulty was met in finding persons willing to enlist into the army; but he could assure the House that the greatest difficulty was found in inducing sailors to enter the Navy. The right hon. Baronet had also spoken of the state of their steam naval force. He could tell the right hon. Baronet, that in this respect, they were inferior to their neighbours on the Continent, who built their steam vessels for an increased number of men and weight of metal; while they (the British) consulted only the rate of speed in their naval architecture. He (Sir Charles Napier) was glad to hear that there were 50,000 efficient pensioners—men able to bear arms in the country. He was glad to hear this, because they, with a little training, and the 30,000 of a standing army in England and Ireland, constituted a sufficient defence against foreign invasion.

SUPPLY—HARBOURS OF REFUGE—FIRE AT QUEBEC — DISSENTING MINISTERS (IRELAND).] House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

On the Motion that 80,300*l.* be voted to defray the Superannuation of Persons formerly employed in the Civil Departments of the Government,

Mr. Hume appealed to the right hon. Baronet as a man of peace, and not a man of war, to know what had been done with respect to the formation of harbours of refuge.

Sir R. Peel said, that a Committee had been appointed to investigate this subject, and their investigation would be continued during the recess. He thought the House and the country were much indebted to the hon. Member for Montrose for having called the attention of the Government to the subject.

Mr. Philip Howard had formed one of a deputation which waited on the right hon. Baronet urging the necessity of converting Douglas, in the Isle of Man, into a harbour of refuge; and to effect that object, the authorities of the island were ready to devote a portion of their revenues, if they were supported in that project by the Government. The celebrated Paul Jones had, almost within memory, burnt St. Mary's Isle, threatened Whitehaven, and scoured those seas with impunity, showing, in the event of war with America or France, the necessity of a well-protected seaboard. To the strictly defensive policy of constructing harbours of refuge, the Queen's Government should apply its early and best attention; and the claim of the Manxmen was full worthy of attention.

On the Question, that a sum of 11,800*l.* be granted for the Polish Refugees, and distressed Spaniards,

Mr. J. Abel Smith said, it might not be out of place for him here to remark upon the news that had that day reached the City of another disastrous fire in Quebec, by which 1,300 houses were burned to the ground, and several thousands of persons had been reduced to total destitution and to great suffering. He wished to ask whether Government contemplated to alleviate in any way the distress of these poor people?

Sir R. Peel said, the news had reached him only this morning, and he had heard it with the utmost regret, that another and an equally serious calamity had fallen on the city of Quebec. On the former occasion Government had done all in their power for the sufferers; and he was sure that now similar care and sympathy would be shown. The people of the country had shown great sympathy with the sufferers, and thinking as he did that Parliament should show its sympathy also, before the Supply was completely gone through, he promised to propose a Vote for the purpose.

Sir Howard Douglas wished to state some particulars relative to the late fire in Quebec, which had just reached him. The first fire took place on the 28th of May, and destroyed 1,600 houses; and, the second, on the 28th of June, and destroyed 1,300 houses. The extent of the calamity could be best ascertained by comparing the amount of loss with the numbers of the population. Quebec was a town containing 35,000 inhabitants, and the loss occasioned by the two fires amounted to 1,250,000*l.* From this it would appear that the calamity was greater in proportion than the great fire of London. He trusted that the liberality of this country would not be appealed to in vain for the relief of the sufferers.

Vote agreed to.

On the Question that the sum of 35,630*l.* be granted for Nonconforming and other Ministers in Ireland,

Mr. Sharman Crawford said, that it was his intention to take the sense of the House upon this Vote. He was an advocate of the voluntary principle, and he therefore felt it his duty to oppose this grant of money for the support of religious ministers. The grant had been progressively increasing; it went on increasing from year to year, and was likely, if not opposed, to go on increasing; and he therefore felt it his duty, as an advocate of the voluntary system, to oppose it. There was a portion of this sum which was to be applied for the benefit of clergymen's widows, and to that part he had no objection; nor would he, in case the Vote were discontinued, object to an arrangement for the benefit of those ministers at present in the enjoyment of those allowances, taking care to prevent a perpetual recurrence of such a Vote as this, to which he was entirely opposed on principle. He would, therefore, move that the sum voted for this purpose be reduced to 366*l.*

Mr. Williams supported the Amendment of the hon. Member for Rochdale. He was opposed to votes of public money for the support of religious ministers of any denomination.

Mr. Hindley said, that there was much difference of opinion as to the propriety of accepting grants of public money amongst the Dissenters. The Presbyterians in Ireland were generally in favour of such grants, and there was, therefore, no inconsistency in their accepting this Vote; but the Independents and Baptists were opposed to such grants.

Mr. Hume thought that they ought not to divide on this Motion until they had a statement from the Government as to whether it was prepared to promise such an arrangement as would prevent the Vote of this sum after a given time.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer could not obtain the support of e hon. Gentleman opposite by giving any assurance that the Vote would be discontinued after a particular period.

The Committee divided on the Question, that a sum not exceeding 366*l.* be granted: —Ayes 13; Noes 71: Majority 58.

Original Question agreed to.

SUPPLY—NEW ZEALAND.] On the Motion that 22,565*l.* be granted to Her Majesty to defray the Charges of the Colony of New Zealand being put,

Mr. John Abel Smith observed, that he understood that the New Zealand Company, confiding in the expressions made use of by the right hon. Baronet (Sir R.

Peel)—and he could assure the right hon. Baronet that he thought he spoke the sentiments of the various members of the Company, when he said that he believed those expressions had been sincere—the Company had, since the last discussion, addressed a letter to the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies, making certain proposals to the noble Lord, with a view to the settlement of the differences existing, unhappily, between the Government and the Company. He understood also, that upon the receipt of that letter, the Under Secretary, the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. G. W. Hope), expressed a wish to re-open the negotiations which had recently been carried on between the parties; that a deputation of the Company had waited upon him; that these negotiations were continued up to this moment; and that they now awaited for their final conclusion the approval of the noble Lord at the head of the Colonial department, whose unavoidable temporary absence had prevented that from being given up to the present moment. The Company were satisfied to rest upon that state of things for the present, and hoped that the noble Lord would look with favour upon the propositions which had been submitted to him; but they wished to understand if, in the event of their hopes in this respect being disappointed, and of the attempt at adjustment, which they had sincerely made, being fruitless, they should have another opportunity of making those remarks upon the present state of New Zealand which they would have done on the present occasion, had these negotiations not now been pending. If the hopes of the Company were not realized, he trusted that the opportunity sought for would be given before the close of the present Session.

Sir R. Peel entertained a sincere wish to see all differences satisfactorily adjusted between the Company and the Colonial department, and to co-operate in every way in which he could for the well-being of the Colony of New Zealand. No one could regret more than he did the differences which had arisen between the Company and the Government. Communications had now passed between the Colonial Office and a deputation appointed to act on the part of the Company; and the members of that deputation were themselves, so far, the best judges of what had passed. He trusted that an amicable arrangement would ultimately be come to, and the probability was that such would be the case; but if it should not be so, he saw no difficulty in giving an assurance that, if the present opportunity of discussing the matter were foregone, another opportunity, as desired, would be given for the discussion.

Mr. G. W. Hope said, that the absence of his noble Friend was not the only reason why the negotiation was not yet concluded. Another Gentleman had been called in to give his advice, and he was preparing his views, which would, when submitted, receive full consideration.

Mr. Roebuck said, that when New Zealand was first colonized, the country had been led to expect that a new era in colonization had commenced. He believed that if a little care were taken, and proper preparation made, before colonization was attempted, they might have a self-sustaining system. A great deal had been said of the danger which existed to colonists so situated as were those of New Zealand; but if they formed a general government on the principle of the representative system, there would be no danger whatever. Let them have a Governor representing the Crown, an Executive Council appointed by the Crown, and a legislative body appointed by counties, and let the legislature of the Colony be formed on this basis. Let the administration be in the Governor, with the advice, though not necessarily with the consent of the Council. It was surprising, seeing that we had colonized the whole of North America, that we had not by this time acquired sufficient knowledge and experience to colonize so small a portion of the earth's surface without the terrible squabbles which had been carried on between the Government and the Company—squabbles, terrible from the consequences to which they had, in some measure, led. What he wished to press upon the Government was, that they should adopt a general system. If they sent out to New Zealand a body of men, who understood the business of political surveying, who would lay the country out into counties, and if they had a general law prepared that each county, as it attained its necessary share of population, should receive its law from the law and from nothing else; and that it should govern itself, not by giving to it municipal powers—a course against which he would warn the right hon. Baronet—a course which would split the country into sections—into a north and south island—which would make an Ireland and an England, a Rhode Island and a Connecticut, of it; but, if they kept the country one, with one central government, with a county administration, with no municipal, that is to say, with no legislative powers, then there would be a chance of governing the country well, and of rendering it prosperous. This single regulation also should be attended to, that metropolitan interference should only be resorted to to defend, when necessary, the Colony from hostile attacks. Let the colonists, so far as related to their local concerns, govern themselves, and let the Government of this country entrust the internal management of the Colony to their activity and exertions, to their daring and sagacity. The Government should not allow one hour to pass before they framed a uniform system of Government for the whole of the Colony.

Mr. Hume said, that the manner in which the Colonies had been treated required that Parliament should pass an Act, declaring what rights they were to possess, and what government they were to enjoy, and they would then be prepared to carry out the suggestions of his hon. and learned Friend. The great defect of our present system was to be found in the Colonial Department itself; the evil existed at head quarters. People might plan what they liked for the good government of the Colonies elsewhere; but so long as the Colonial Department remained defective, nothing in the way of permanent good could be accomplished. There was no prospect of an improved system in regard to our Colonies until they introduced some change into the Colonial Department by legislative enactment. He entreated the right hon. Baronet, in reference to this unfortunate matter, to step boldly out, and take the course which he well knew to be the right one, and to bring forward proper measures by which to impart confidence to the colonists. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would do this, for nobody trusted the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies. As to this Vote, he thought that they had already thrown away too much money for the support of Colonial misrule, and he felt it his duty to oppose it.

Mr. Sheil could not concur with his hon. Friend in his opposition to the Vote. He thought that it was but wise and prudent to fortify every settlement which was exposed to such an attack as Kororarika had sustained; and as to Captain Grey, the newly appointed Governor of New Zealand, it appeared to him that they should be liberal in their remuneration of a man who had the arduous duty to perform of correcting the calamitous mistakes into which the Colonial Office had been betrayed. No doubt some of the misfortunes of New Zealand were to be attributed to want of experience and incapacity on the part of Captain Fitzroy; but it was not at all on the vicarious back of Captain Fitzroy that the chastisement should exclusively fall. Who appointed Captain Fitzroy? By whom was he instructed? Of whom was Captain Fitzroy the undistorted image? If a different policy had been pursued towards New Zealand—if a different construction had been put upon the Treaty of Waitangi—if the construction adopted by the Committee, at the suggestion of Lord Francis Egerton, had been made the rule of the Government—if the contract had been fulfilled which was entered into by Lord John Russell—if Mr. Pennington's award had been carried into effect—if the Company, in consideration of their expenditure of 600,000*l.*, had got a single acre of land—if the Company had been induced, or rather permitted, to apply their vast capital and immense resources to the colonization of New Zealand, it was manifest that all the evils now loudly complained of, and deeply deplored, would not have happened; it was clear that property and life would have been protected in New Zealand; it was manifest that the New Zealanders themselves would have been signally served; that the value of the property in their possession, and to which their title would have been confirmed, would have been augmented from twenty to a hundred fold; and that the New Zealander himself, civilized and humanized, would have largely participated in the many advantages which would have been generally diffused. He thought, that such was not an exaggerated view of what, in all likelihood, would have taken place in New Zealand had a different policy been pursued. It was urged that Lord Stanley had been influenced in what he did by motives of humanity towards the New Zealanders. That assertion he was not disposed to question, nor did he doubt but that Lord Stanley had given that interpretation to the Treaty of Waitangi which he considered most conducive to the interests of the New Zealanders. He thought, however, that the noble Lord had utterly mistaken the real interests of the native population, and that he had entailed great calamities, unwittingly, on the New Zealanders. If the Company had been the victims of his injustice, the New Zealanders had been the victims of his commiseration. Let them look at the results of the noble Lord's policy, and try that policy by its fruits. What had been the effects of the pseudo conciliation which had been adopted in reference to the New Zealanders? They were informed by the principal Protector of the aborigines, Mr. George Clarke he believed, that notwithstanding the interpretation given by Lord Stanley to the Treaty of Waitangi, and notwithstanding the strenuousness with which the rights of the New Zealanders had been protected, the Government, the conciliatory Government, were still the objects of abhorrence and scorn to the native population; and Captain Fitzroy himself, as was stated in Sir Everard Home's despatch, mentioned that the Colony was on the very verge of ruin, and that on the events of the next few months the tenure of the Colony by Great Britain might depend. Under these circumstances, it was manifest that some great change, some essential alteration, was necessary. The Government saw the malady; and for such a malady it was quite clear that petty medicaments, small doses, prescriptions at once empirical and homœopathic, combining strange experiments with erroneous practice, would not suffice. The Company asked the Government of this country to infuse the representative principle into the Government of New Zealand. It had been observed that a representative assembly was not fitted for New Zealand. That, perhaps, was quite true. Kororarika, though once a promising settlement, was now reduced to the state of Old Sarum, with but one house left in it, and he should certainly not propose that Kororarika should send a Member to the Colonial Parliament; but if three or four persons were delegated from Wellington and Auckland, and were to form component parts of the legislative Council, it was quite manifest that there would then be, in regard to New Zealand, something like that which was so important in our own constitutional system—a check upon the power, which was now next to unlimited, in the Colony. At present the Colony was under a legislative Council, and the legislative Council was under Lord Stanley. This was certainly an order of dependence in which it was highly desirable, if not indispensable, that an alteration should be made. It was not quite legitimate for the Government to say that the Company had asked them to establish in New Zealand a Colonial Parliament. That was not the case. The Company only wanted the Government to infuse some portion of the representative system into the Colonial Government. The decision of Lord Stanley was not irrevocable, and he might yet see good reason to change that decision, in compliance with the desires of the Company. With respect to the land question, the sources of mischief still continued. The Government still adhered to their interpretation of the Treaty of Waitangi, which they did in direct opposition to the Report of the Committee. He was very far from saying that the Report of a Committee was to be regarded as paramount in every case, although to Reports of Committees they occasionally attached very great importance. Lord Stanley had been condemned by a Report of a Committee of that House. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department relied for his acquittal upon the Report of that House. For three weeks the right hon. Gentleman was almost in a state of continuous ovation, on account of the Report of such a Committee. They were told to look at the manner in which that Committee had been constituted—happily constituted—that there were six Whigs and five Tories, all men of high intelligence and of remarkable impartiality. That was the course taken by the right hon. Baronet; but then the Government did not venture to take that course with New Zealand. When fault was imputed to the right hon. Gentleman, they were content with six Whigs and five Tories; but in the case of the noble Lord, two-thirds of their Committee were Tories and one-third Whigs; and upon that Committee they placed Members of the Government and embryo Ministers—Gentlemen who proved their capacity to serve the Government by their high qualifications, and the effective service they rendered on that Committee. But when it happened that the Report of that Committee was against Lord Stanley, it was unnoticed. The Prime Minister, in the course of his observations, never adverted to the Report of the Committee. He had marked with that attention which every word uttered by the right hon. Gentleman was entitled to, and he observed that he never referred to the Committee, to the proceedings of the Committee, or to the Report of the Committee. It would be a bold proposition for a Prime Minister to say, that a Committee appointed by himself — let them mark that — a Committee appointed by the Government—a majority, a great majority, being the supporters of the Government — several of them Members of the Government—that the Report of such a Committee should be dismissed with utter disregard. What was the object of that inquiry? What the object of these observations? A great mistake had been committed. It had been suggested that that mistake should be repaired. It was to show the Government that if they would not go the entire length with the Committee, that the right hon. Gentleman perhaps might use his influence to induce Lord Stanley to retrace his course. He was the last man in that House to say that Lord Stanley should be treated with disrespect. His talents were great, and as a Parliamentary debater, he was far superior to almost any one he had ever heard; but if Lord Stanley were as calm and as unimpassioned as he was beyond doubt prompt, dexterous, and agile; and if his talents were not as peculiarly remarkable in every department in which he had been engaged, still he (Mr. Sheil) ventured to say that New Zealand ought not to be sacrificed to him, and that in choosing between the retention of a great patrician in the Cabinet, and the maintenance and happiness of a great British possession of the Crown, the latter ought to be preferred.

Sir R. Peel said, he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dungarvon (Mr. Sheil) was deprived of the opportunity on the last occasion that the subject of New Zealand was debated in that House, of delivering the speech he had just made, and which was intended, as he thought, for a Motion very different from that which was now submitted to the House, and of which he cordially approved. He knew how painful it was for hon. Members at the end of a Session to carry away undelivered speeches with them, and he should have sympathised with the right hon. Gentleman in his disappointment if he had not had the opportunity of making this speech. The second debate on the affairs of New Zealand lasted two nights; and, as the right hon. Gentleman had referred to what had then had fallen from him, he begged to observe that he thought it would have been more appropriate had the right hon. Gentleman made those observations on that occasion. He certainly should not now be provoked to a renewal of the discussion on New Zealand, because he did not consider that it would be for the public interest, or the interest of the Colony itself. In noticing the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, he would not even do what it was painful for him to refrain from doing, namely, enter into a defence of his noble Friend at the head of the Colonial Department, and repel the imputations which he thought were unjustly cast upon him. He could not do that without affording an opportunity for a renewed discussion, which he deprecated only upon public grounds. He felt the less regret, however, in adopting this course, because he thought that on the last and preceding occasion he did everything in his power to show that there was not that diversity of sentiment between his noble Friend and himself that had been imputed, and upon those occasions he certainly did exert himself to vindicate his noble Friend from the accusation directed against him. The right hon. Gentleman said that his noble Friend must be held responsible for the appointment of Captain Fitzroy. He admitted that, speaking technically — he granted that his noble Friend was responsible for the appointment; but, at the same time, he thought that it would be most ungenerous if, for every act of Mr. Hobson or Captain Fitzroy, he said to the noble Lord the Member for the city of London, "You appointed these gentlemen, and in the eye of the Constitution, you are responsible, and I hold you culpable for every act they have done." That doctrine was constitutionally and technically true; but, morally speaking, his noble Friend could not be held responsible for all the acts which were performed. With regard to the question of the militia, his noble Friend informed Captain Fitzroy, some months ago, that he thought a militia should be organized; that there ought to be a local force established. But Captain Fitzroy differed from him, and did not act upon the instructions. It was quite true that his noble Friend was constitutionally responsible for the non-performance of this order; but he did not think that any gentleman out of the House would say that his noble Friend must be considered morally responsible for the decision come to by Captain Fitzroy. Captain Fitzroy, acting, no doubt, upon pure and honourable, though mistaken views, declined organizing the militia. The House might be assured, however, that his noble Friend had no wish to throw on Captain Fitzroy any responsibility that belonged to himself. As to the appointment of that gentleman, there never was an appointment made from purer or more disinterested motives. His noble Friend took Captain Fitzroy because he sincerely believed that he was a man better competent than almost any other for the discharge of the functions of Governor of New Zealand. With regard to the mode in which the Colony should be governed, he did not see much difference between the views of the hon. and learned Member for Bath, and those which he entertained. The hon. and learned Gentleman said, "Don't let there be municipal government, but county government." For any territorial division of the country they must take, as the centre, the largest town of the district; then incorporate with that town as large a district as they possibly could, and give the natives resident within the district the right of representation, and all the advantages of British subjects. By circumscribing the district, they excluded the possibility of mere ignorant physical force overpowering the spirit, enterprise, and intelligence of the English colonists. If they provided that every one of the natives should be entitled to vote, it was possible that a combination might be formed, and mere numbers overcome the settlers; but if they took their districts, and gave the natives an equal franchise, that would be a sort of county institution. He would certainly give a liberal franchise, and he thought that the body to be entrusted with the taxation of the Colony should have as extensive powers of taxation for county purposes as were consistent with the proper exercise of the functions of the supreme authority. The constitution of this supreme authority was a most important question; but that in some way or other, the Legislative Council—the governing body—ought to represent the public opinion of the Colony, was a principle which he was ready to admit. How that could be best accomplished, it was impossible for him to lay down, at this moment, any precise rule. Having alluded to the appointment of Captain Grey, who, he stated, should be amply remunerated for any loss he might sustain, the right hon. Baronet concluded by observing, that it was neither for the advantage of the Colony, nor for the public interest, that this discussion should be further continued.

Mr. Hawes was glad to hear that the intercourse between the Colonial Office and the New Zealand Company had been revived. This was creditable to the Colonial Office, after so many sharp debates; and he trusted that the whole matter would soon be brought to a satisfactory conclusion.

Mr. C. Buller said, that nothing could be in a better tone than was the speech of the right hon. Baronet; and he should feel greatly disappointed if the communications now going on between the Colonial Office and the New Zealand Company were not attended with the most satisfactory results. As to the choice of a Governor for the Colony, they ought to recollect that for a new settlement they required as a Governor a man of great ability, and 1,200*l.* a year was not sufficient for a gentleman going out as Governor of New Zealand: a taxing officer in one of the Law Courts in Dublin, his right hon. Friend informed them, got as high a salary. While they were voting the Estimates for New Zealand, they ought to take as much as would pay the debt at once. Now, the present Estimates did not give a fair notion of what the Colony required. In some Papers from Captain Fitzroy, the expenditure of this year was estimated at from 36,000*l.* to 40,000*l.*, and the only revenue to meet that, was 14,000*l.*, leaving a deficit of 22,000*l.* But of the 14,000*l.*, Captain Fitzroy calculated on receiving 8,000*l.* from property tax, and 2,000*l.* from land titles. The first return showed that the property tax would not produce 4,000*l.* instead of 8,000*l.*, and as to the revenue from land titles, by allowing parties to purchase from the natives, it was swept away altogether. Thus, then, all they had was 8,000*l.* as a revenue, with an expenditure of 36,000*l.* or 40,000*l.* leaving a deficit of 32,000*l.* The present Estimate was only for 22,000*l.* and odd, and they had a debt of 15,000*l.*, for which they had issued their debentures. He did not think that there could be a less deficiency than 40,000*l.* in amount. He wished to call the attention of the Committee to another point. Captain Fitzroy had made a reduction in every one's salary in the Colony. He had taken one-fourth of each person's salary. They had, for instance, sent out Mr. Chapman as a judge, with a salary of 800*l.* a year; by Captain Fitzroy's regulations that had been reduced below 600 a year. This he considered a very hard case. Why was a difference to be made between judges? What right had this gentleman to expect that the Governor would have swept the customs from 22,000*l.* down to 8,000*l.*, and that he should be made to suffer for it? They ought to keep faith with the public servants; and in this instance they ought to take such an Estimate as would enable them, amongst other things, to pay this gentleman the salary they had contracted to give him.

Mr. Aglionby observed, that there appeared to him to be very little difference between the opinions of the hon. and learned Member for Bath, and the right hon. Baronet, as to that species of representative government which should be given to New Zealand. He hoped that the result of the proceedings that had been alluded to would be good government, under which the Colony would prosper.

Viscount Ebrington said, he rejoiced heartily to hear once more that there was a prospect of agreement between the Company and the Colonial Office; but he warned the House not to expect any satisfactory settlement until some clear and intelligible principle had been laid down for dealing with the waste lands. All the great writers on international law were agreed on the subject. Their authority had been already appealed to in this controversy; but he would venture to trouble the House with the opinions of a great and good man, the late Dr. Arnold, who thus wrote in the Englishman's Register, in June 1831, long before the New Zealand question had arisen:—

"It is said the land belongs to everybody—nothing belongs to everybody; it either belongs to somebody or to nobody at all. The air belongs to nobody, the open sea belongs to nobody, and for this reason, because man has done nothing and can do nothing to make them better for his use than God made them from the beginning. They are not his property at all; but with the earth or land, and all things on it, is quite different. Men were to subdue the earth, that is, make it by their labour what it would not have been by itself; and with the labour so bestowed upon it, came the right of property in it. Thus every land which is inhabited all belongs to somebody. But so much does the right of property go along with labour, that enlightened nations have never scrupled to take possession of countries inhabited only by savages—countries which have been hunted over, but never subdued or cultivated."

How different is the case of New Zealand, where the natives derived no supplies of food from the slaves, but depended on cultivation for their support! but where yet, he heard it stated in evidence again and again, not one thousandth part of the land had ever been cultivated. Dr. Arnold goes on to say—

"It is true they have often gone further and settled themselves in countries which were cultivated, and then it becomes robbery; but when our fathers went to America, and took possession of the mere hunting grounds of the Indians of lands on which man had hitherto bestowed no labour, they only exercised a right which God has inseparably united with industry and knowledge."

These are clear intelligible principles, clarly laid down; but up to this time no intelligible principle had been avowed by the Government on this subject; and as the land question was at the bottom of all the difficulties and disturbances in New Zealand, he thought the House ought not to be satisfied till Ministers declared how the waste lands were to be dealt with, whether they formed part of the domain of the Crown or not. Unless Government made up their minds to grapple firmly with this question, all hopes of a satisfactory settlement would be illusory; and these civil speeches between the Company and the Ministers, preferable as they were to their previous unseemly squabbles, would only terminate once more as they had so often before, in renewed disputes and disappointments.

Mr. G. W. Hope, leaving the general question as having been already sufficiently discussed, would confine himself to the amount of the present estimate. He agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard, that the smallness of the Vote required some justification. The fact was, that among the many other difficulties in which the late Governor had left the Government (and he wished not to press unduly upon Captain Fitzroy), was that of great uncertainty as to the state of the finances of the Colony. He was not prepared to say that the calculations upon which this Vote was founded would prove to be correct; but in preparing the Estimates for Parliament the Colonial Office could only proceed upon such documents as had been furnished to them. And the only statement in reference to this, the financial question, which had been supplied to the Government by Captain Fitzroy, was that which had been referred to by the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard himself.

Mr. W. Williams had come down to the House expecting that this Vote was to be opposed. That, he believed, was the general understanding. But it appeared now that the Company having got their million of acres of land secured to them, as he supposed they had or would have under the renewed negotiation with the Colonial Office, they were for increasing instead of opposing the Estimates, knowing very well that the more money was expended in the Colony, the better it would be for themselves. He had no doubt if the Session lasted much longer, they would have a Supplemental Estimate brought in for New Zealand. For his part, he thought we were already taxed enough for this mismanaged Colony. Would the hon. Gentleman say whether this Vote included all that this country would be called upon to pay on account of the present year, or whether he intended to propose a Supplemental Estimate?

Mr. G. W. Hope had already stated that the calculations upon which the present Estimate was framed, were made upon very imperfect information.

Mr. Mangles believed, if the colonists of New Zealand were allowed to govern themselves, there would be a revenue more than sufficient to meet all the expenses of the Colony, without calling for any aid from this country.

Mr. B. Osborne was somewhat surprised at the turn the discussion had taken. It appeared now that the attention of the House had been taken up by a mere squabble between the New Zealand Company and the Government, and now that that dispute was in a fair way for settlement, the more important question of whether the Colonial Department as now constituted was fit to be intrusted with the destinies of our vast Colonial Empire, was altogether lost sight of.

Mr. Hindley complained that the present Bishop of New Zealand had consecrated, for the exclusive burial of Protestants, a portion of the cemetery which had hitherto been used for the interment of the inhabitants of the Colony generally, without regard to religious distinctions. He had received communications stating that this act of the Bishop's had given great dissatisfaction, and that a petition would be forwarded to him for presentation to the House of Commons on the subject.

Admiral Dundas could not allow any aspersions to be cast on the character of the present Bishop of New Zealand, without standing up in his defence. He believed no man had ever exercised the functions of his office with greater zeal and devotion—no man had been more successful in the performance of his sacred duties—and there was no man whose character was, in every respect, more exemplary than that of the right rev. Prelate.

Mr. Protheroe asked, was it intended that this country should be saddled with the ecclesiastical establishments of New Zealand?

Mr. G. W. Hope was understood to say, that, in the present state of the Colony, it was necessary that the means of religious instruction for the inhabitants should be provided by this country.

Mr. B. Osborne wished to know whether the present Governor was to have any increase of salary, as compared with the former Governors.

Mr. G. W. Hope said, the present Governor went out on a special mission, and he would, therefore, receive a special allowance. That special allowance would be 2,500*l.* a year, instead of 1,200*l.* a year, which was the salary of the late Governor.

Mr. W. Williams observed, that from all he had heard, he believed the present Bishop of New Zealand to be a most estimable person, and in every way fitted for the duties of his sacred office; but he thought the charge for the ecclesiastical establishment of the Colony ought not to be placed upon this country. He hoped that means would be taken to provide for the payment of the clergy out of the revenue arising from the waste lands of the Colony.

Viscount Sandon agreed that it would be impossible for this country to maintain the ecclesiastical establishments of all the Colonies. He believed that by an appropriation of the waste lands means might be provided for the religious training and education of the people, and for all clerical purposes, and he considered that the colonists ought to be put in a position, as soon as possible, to provide a religious establishment for themselves by those means.

Mr. Hindley was an advocate for the voluntary principle in all cases. But he believed the New Zealand Company had already turned their attention to the subject, and had invested 7,000*l.* in the hands of trustees for church purposes in New Zealand. Under these circumstances he thought it was hard that the charge should be thrown on this country. He had no wish to asperse the character of the Bishop of New Zealand; but if the statements which had been made to him were true, Dr. Selwyn had, he thought, acted imprudently in consecrating, for the exclusive burial of members of the Established Church, that part of the cemetery which had been previously used in common by all sects. He might have selected another piece of ground for the purpose.

Mr. Aglionby said, his hon. Friend was quite correct in supposing that the New Zealand Company had set apart a large sum for the purposes of religious instruction, and they had granted assistance in this respect without regard to any feelings of partiality for one religion more than another. They had been guided only by the proportionate numbers of each sect in the particular locality to which the grant was made, and they had given the largest division of the funds to the members of the Established Church, as being the largest body.

Vote agreed to.

Upon the Question that the sum of 2,597*l.* be granted for Salaries and Expenses of the Commission for the improvement of the river Shannon, SUPPLY — THE SHANNON.] Colonel Sibthorp trusted that when this sum was expended this Commission would cease, and that Parliament would not be called upon to vote any more money for improving the estates of two noble Lords, under pretence of improving the river Shannon. He looked upon the whole proceeding as a gross job from beginning to end.

Mr. B. Osborne supposed that the two noble Lords to whom the hon. and gallant Officer referred were the Marquess of Lansdowne and Lord Monteagle.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer could assure the hon. and gallant Officer that the money voted for improving the Shannon, had been applied in that which was an important public work, carried on under the most competent engineers, and would be completed in the shortest possible period of time. With regard to the expense of the Commission itself, one person only as a Member of that Commission received salary.

Viscount Sandon denied that the improvement of the Shannon was a job. He felt bound, in justice to a noble Lord who was absent, to say, that having ascertained some years ago, in Liverpool, that it would be an object of great importance to fourteen counties to improve the navigation of the Shannon, he (Viscount Sandon) urged the subject upon the attention of the then Chancellor of the Exchequer (the present Lord Monteagle), who was at length by dint of persuasion induced to adopt means for carrying out the work. He for one believed the improvement would be found of more real value to Ireland, than all the railroads that had been projected.

Vote agreed to.

SUPPLY — ST. MARGARET'S, WESTMINSTER.] On the Question that 1,020*l.* be granted in aid of repairing St. Margaret's Church, Westminster,

Mr. P. Borthwick objected to the Vote, upon the ground, that the money lately expended on this building had been laid out on embellishments in the worst possible taste. He thought that the church ought to be pulled down altogether, and another constructed in a different part of the parish. He must also say that much bad taste was displayed in the monuments in the neighbouring Abbey of Westminster, which, he said, were unlike anything in the heaven above, in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth. He objected strongly, too, to the mythological devices introduced into a Christian church, and the showmanlike manner in which they were exhibited.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer remarked, that architectural amateurs were quite insatiable in their demands for public money to be spent in carrying out their ideas. As to St. Margaret's Church, as the House of Commons occupied it in some sort, seats being allotted for the Speaker and Members, they ought to pay for its necessary reparations; and with respect to pulling down the church, it would cost from 40,000*l.* to 50,000*l.* were it to be removed, and another substituted in its place.

Mr. Bernal Osborne was in favour of the demolition of the church, as a Committee of the House had already suggested. As to Members going there, that was only a parliamentary fiction. He thought that even 50,000*l.* would not be too much to be expended in effecting the object in view.

Mr. Hindley thought the Vote should be postponed, and the church ultimately pulled down, as it would be in the way of the proposed Westminster improvements.

Viscount Sandon should regret to see 40,000*l.* expended in the way proposed. If they intended to spend money in architectural improvements, they ought to begin by pulling down the two towers of the Abbey, erected as they were in defiance of taste and architectural propriety.

Mr. Abel Smith agreed with the first observations of the noble Lord. He thought, however, that St. Margaret's burial-ground should be removed, and he hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not overlook the matter.

Mr. Sheil had a curiosity—he would not in the presence of the noble Lord opposite characterize the word in any way—but he really had a curiosity to know whether the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool, or the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had ever attended divine service at the church in question?

Viscount Sandon: Yes, twice.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer: Yes, once.

Mr. Sheil could understand how the right hon. Gentleman had gone. The Speaker went there once a year, and the right hon. Gentleman had probably accompanied him on one of these occasions. But very few Members of the House had ever been within the walls of St. Margaret's church. They should then put out of the case the use made by the House of Commons of the church. He thought, moreover, that there should be full parochial accommodation for the inhabitants of the district. Now, was the Abbey turned to as much account as it might be in this way? There was a most noble building—he never could enter it without thinking of the uses to which it was once put, although he would refrain from any anticipations or speculations as to whether it might ever be put to these uses again. But did it not occur to them that, in a building of such vast size, within which he almost always found reigning a most solemn mysterious solitude, did it not occur to them that it might be turned to some useful purpose? How were matters managed at present? They took a small section, and crowded a congregation into it; a congregation only large by contrast with the place in which it was bestowed; while, by enlarging that portion of the edifice, they would be providing for parochial accommodation, and applying the church to its proper purposes as a place of worship. When he saw Mr. Barry's beautiful design from Westminster Bridge—and he never saw a more beautiful one—when that design was completed, would not St. Margaret's be an eyesore? Again, when they came down Parliament-street, would it not obstruct their view of the Abbey, and in coming from the Parks by the proposed new street, would it not be equally in the way? He was not disposed to have 40,000*l.* or 50,000*l.* voted for Westminster improvements were such obstructions to be allowed to continue. He did hope that the understanding formerly, as he understood, come to, that the church would be got rid of when the new Houses were built, would be really acted upon.

Mr. Hawes said, that the sum alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman was not voted in supply from his pocket. The fund for metropolitan improvements came from the coal tax imposed on the port of London.

Mr. Sheil: It comes from my pocket, nevertheless. I don't burn turf.

Sir J. Graham agreed with the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool, and his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The objection taken to the church was not only that it intercepted the view, but the site itself was very objectionable. Suppose the expense of rebuilding the church not to exceed 40,000*l.*, where was a new site to be found? He believed that it would require an expenditure of more than 60,000*l.* to provide the necessary accommodation. The parent church must be maintained, and he conceived that no more economical plan could be devised than the grant now proposed.

Viscount Sandon trusted the dean and chapter of Westminster would attend to the suggestions which had been thrown out, and he believed that some alteration was intended to be made.

Mr. Protheroe was of opinion that St. Margaret's Church was a very fair specimen of undecorated Gothic architecture. The only part of the Abbey which was concealed by the Church was the ugly portion between the north entrance and Henry the Seventh's chapel, and St. Margaret's Church was far more sightly. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dungarvon had asked how many Members of Parliament attended that church. In former years, he (Mr. Protheroe) frequently attended St. Margaret's Church, both in the morning and evening, and often saw a considerable number there. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would turn his attention to the state of St. Margaret's churchyard. The effluvia arising from it was most disagreeable, and hon. Members, whose attendance in Parliament was compulsory, suffered more or less from the air sent into the House by Dr. Reid.

Mr. M. J. O'Connell would not go into the discussion whether or not this church was a good specimen of Gothic architecture; for this was not a Committee of Taste but of Supply. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had over-estimated the difficulty of procuring a site. He had the honour of sitting on a Committee connected with this subject, and the result of their investigation was, that several sites could now be procured at a comparatively cheap rate, which in a few years might cost a large sum. He hoped, then, Government would lose no time in getting rid of the nuisance of the churchyard, which, in his belief, was injurious to the health of Members of that House, and he was sure was so to persons who resided in the neighbourhood. He did not think the Vote should be postponed; for they would probably have to pay next year a much larger sum if no provision was now made for the repair of the church.

Mr. Escott felt somewhat alarmed at the tone of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who evidently intended that St. Margaret's Church should remain permanently. If they consented to vote hundreds of thousands every year for the New Palace at Westminster, and could not afford 20,000*l.* or 30,000*l.* for the removal of that church, it would be better to put a stop to the improvements altogether. He considered the church to be a complete disgrace to the neighbourhood.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the Archdeacon, at his visitation, had presented the church as not being in a fit state of repair.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 44; Noes 19: Majority 25.

Vote agreed to.

SUPPLY — STATUES IN THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.] On the Question that 2,000*l.* be granted for statues to Hampden, Lord Falkland, and Lord Clarendon,

Mr. Williams hoped that amongst the illustrious rulers of this country to whom statues were to be erected, Cromwell would not be forgotten. He believed that, of the monarchs who ruled this country for 1,000 years, there was not one to be found more distinguished as a soldier and a statesman. Cromwell was as worthy of remembrance by the people of this country as Napoleon by the people of France. Less crime and less cruelty could be brought home to him than to any one who had attained such renown as a warrior and statesman.

Mr. Hutt could assure his hon. Friend who had pronounced so eloquent an eulogium on Cromwell, that it was currently reported that a statue to his hon. Friend's favourite ruler was not excluded from the list of those about to be erected.

Mr. Williams: I am very glad to hear it.

Vote agreed to.

SUPPLY—FOREIGN AND SECRET SERVICE.] On the Question that 39,000*l.* be granted for Foreign and other Secret Services,

Mr. Williams objected to this Vote. There was none to which the people of England more strongly objected. Bearing in mind the statements made by the Secretary of State for the Home Department at the beginning of the Session, he presumed the whole of the Vote was administered by the Foreign Office; but there never was a time when Secret Service Money was less required, and he should therefore move that the Vote be reduced to 20,000*l.*

The Committee divided on the Question, that the grant be 20,000*l.*:—Ayes 9, Noes 56: Majority 47.

Original Question agreed to.

SUPPLY—EDUCATION (IRELAND).] On the Question that 75,000*l.* be granted to enable the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to issue Money for the advancement of Education, from the 1st of April, 1845, to the 31st of March, 1846,

Mr. G. A. Hamilton stated that, however strongly he was opposed to the National System of Education in Ireland—however he was of opinion that a most important principle had been conceded in it, in order to render it palatable and acceptable to the Roman Catholic party—and, although he should have felt it to be his duty to give it every opposition if now brought forward for the first time, and its principle made the subject of discussion, yet he was ready to admit, all things considered—considering that the system had been now for more than twelve years in operation, supported by three successive Administrations differing from each other in political sentiments, and that school-houses had been built and arrangements made upon the faith of its continuance, he (Mr. Hamilton) should not feel justified in endeavouring so suddenly, as on a Vote in Committee of Supply, to stop a grant for the support of schools in which so many hundred thousand children of the poor in Ireland were now in course of education. It was certainly his intention to have brought under the consideration of the House the present state of the Education Question in Ireland, with the view of vindicating the Protestants of Ireland, and especially the clergy of the Established Church, from the unjust imputations which had been cast upon them, and the odium to which they had been exposed in consequence of their continued and conscientious refusal to identify themselves with, or give their sanction to, that system—and of stating to the House the reasons and motives by which they were actuated. But, at so advanced a period of the Session—in the present position of public business—in the exhausted state of the House, and in the absence of so many of his hon. Friends—he felt it would be useless to attempt to do justice to the subject, and he would, therefore, refrain from raising any discussion respecting it. On the present occasion he would content himself with entering his protest against the principle which was involved in the Vote before the Committee, and expressing the deep regret he felt that Her Majesty's Government had not thought it proper to entertain favourably the strong appeal which had recently been made to them in reference to Scriptural Education in Ireland. That appeal had been made on behalf of the great body of the Protestant laity of Ireland—of 1,700 of the clergy of the Established Church—and was supported by the petitions of more than 63,000 persons which had been presented in that House. The object of the application was to induce Her Majesty's Government to take into their consideration the very painful position in which the Protestant clergy and people of Ireland were placed, who conscientiously object to the present national system—and it urged the claims of 1,820 Scriptural schools, attended by more than 103,000 children of different persuasions. He (Mr. Hamilton) regretted deeply that such an appeal should have been disregarded—had it been entertained, he did believe that the subject would have been approached with a great desire to promote an arrangement or accommodation; and he was sanguine enough to believe, that a satisfactory accommodation might have been arrived at. For the reasons he had stated, he would not trespass further upon the Committee; but would be satisfied with entering his earnest protest against the national system and its principle.

Mr. Osborne complained of the attacks that were made against the system, referring in particular to a speech of the Bishop of Cashel, in the other House of Parliament, wherein that right rev. Prelate stated that seventy-six out of 100 of the children educated in a particular locality could neither read nor write; the fact being, that those were children between the ages of five and ten, a fact which the right rev. Prelate omitted to state. His speech had been quoted and relied on at several public meetings, as containing substantial proofs and charges against the efficiency of the national system of education, but against which no tangible charge had yet been brought forward even by the right rev. Prelate.

Mr. Wyse wished to know from the right hon. Baronet opposite, whether it were intended, as intimated by him at the commencement of the Session, to establish model schools in Ireland, with a view to the introduction of a higher class of education; and also, whether it was intended to incorporate the National Board, so as to give it the power of taking land for the building of schools, particularly in those districts where, as the right hon. Baronet must be aware, there existed great difficulty in obtaining sites for that purpose, owing to the opposition of the proprietary to the national system of education, and in consequence of which, schools were sometimes established in places most inconvenient to the majority of the population. He also wished to know whether it was intended to better the style of existing school-houses, some of which were scarcely better than hovels.

Sir J. Graham had no hesitation in stating that the Board of National Education in Ireland did intend to found in certain districts such schools as he had described at an early part of the Session; and, in order to meet the difficulty referred to by the hon. Member respecting sites for school-houses, it was proposed to recommend to Her Majesty to grant a charter of incorporation to the National Board, whereby they would be enabled to take and appropriate land for that purpose. In reply to the hon. Member's last question, he could state that the attention of the Board had been directed to the state of existing school-houses. The point was one of much difficulty; but he had no doubt that they would be made more worthy of the object to which they were applied.

Mr. M. J. O'Connell said, that it was not the speeches that were made in that House, but out of it, of which he had to complain. Hon. Gentlemen opposite wished for a separate grant for a system of education in connexion with the Protestant Church: they demanded a grant for the Church Education Society; but, if that were conceded, an equivalent, and consequently a much larger grant, should, in justice, be given to a Roman Catholic board for the purpose of Roman Catholic education. Such a course would upset the present united and useful system, and lead to much sectarian bitterness.

Lord C. Hamilton denied that there existed on the part of those who supported the Church Education Society any desire to establish separate boards, and maintained that the boasted success of the national system was merely fictitious, and that the only united system was that of the Church Society. He was prepared to prove, that while that system was both united and liberal, and interfered less with the religious tenets of the children than the national system, it conferred upon all alike, Roman Catholics as well as Protestants, a sound Christian education.

Mr. M. J. O'Connell conceived that a distinct grant to the Church Education Society would have the effect he described. The very name of the society indicated a sectarian character. The Church Catechism was required to be taught in the schools of the Church Education Society. [Lord C. Hamilton: No, no.] Then he could neither understand the Society's name nor the speeches of its supporters. At a meeting last March, the Bishop of Down spoke of the system adopted by the National Board as "anti-Christian, because anti-Scriptural and anti-Church."

Lord C. Hamilton defended the application of the term "anti-Scriptural," and insisted that 815 of the national schools had been found to admit neither the Scriptures nor the Extracts.

Mr. Osborne said, that if the national system did not supply united education, it was because the clergy of the Established Church set their faces against it, and refused to attend at the schools. The rules allowed religious instruction to be given, and provided for it, though no child was to be required to attend if its parents objected. And hon. Members who voted for the Irish Colleges Bill could call this an anti-Scriptural system!

Lord C. Hamilton could justify what he had said, but had much more respect for the Committee than for the observations just made.

Vote agreed to.

SUPPLY — SCOTCH UNIVERSITIES.] On the Vote of 7,380*l.* for grants to the Scotch Universities, formerly paid from the hereditary revenues of the Crown,

Mr. S. Crawford, objecting to any grant to a professor of divinity, moved that the Vote be reduced to 7,228*l.*

The Committee divided on the Question, that the sum be 7,228*l.*:—Ayes 9, Noes 66; Majority 57.

Vote agreed to.

SUPPLY — BRITISH MUSEUM.] On the Question that a sum of 42,040*l.* be granted for the Expenses of the British Museum,

Mr. Wyse wished to call the attention of the Government to a proposition he had before submitted to the House for the Establishment of a Gallery of National Antiquities. Such an establishment might either be connected with the British Museum, or a separate institution might be formed.

Sir R. Peel said, he was fully sensible of the importance of this subject; but there were at present such numerous demands upon the Government for new buildings and for the establishment of new institutions, that they found it absolutely necessary to put some limit upon their expenditure in this department. He thought if such a selection of antiquities as that referred to by the hon. Member for Waterford should be formed, it was most advisable that it should be united with the British Museum, rather than established as a separate institution. He would suggest to the hon. Gentleman the propriety of postponing the consideration of this subject until the new buildings now in course of erection in connexion with the British Museum were completed.

Mr. Wyse said, he did not wish to propose any Motion on the subject. His object was to obtain from the right hon. Baronet at the head of Her Majesty's Government an expression of sympathy in the views he entertained.

Sir R. Peel said, he considered it was far preferable to aid local institutions in preserving local antiquities, than to remove such antiquities from the vicinities with which their interest was immediately connected.

Mr. Hawes adverted to the collection of prints recently purchased for the British Museum, and lauded the care bestowed by the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) in the acquisition of treasures of this kind, and the general liberality and discrimination exhibited by him in matters relating to the fine arts.

Vote agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL CONTINGENCIES.] On the Question that the sum of 50,000*l.* be granted to complete the sum of 100,000*l.*, for Civil Contingencies,

Mr. Williams thought that this sum ought not to be taken in one vote, but that it should be divided into several votes. Upon one portion of the Vote he should take the sense of the Committee—namely, on that relating to the expenditure which had taken place in excursions made on board of Her Majesty's ships of war by certain bishops connected with our dependencies. He also objected to the charge of 25*l.* for conveying the Prince of Prussia from Greenwich to Ostend; as well as to that of 1,200*l.* for such of the Episcopal clergy in Scotland as were most in need of assistance. He thought that these clergymen ought to be maintained by their own congregations, in the same way as the members of the Free Church maintained their pastors. He should move that the Vote be for 47,899*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.*

Sir C. Napier presumed, that the bishops to whom the hon. Gentleman had alluded, had made these excursions in the performance of their duty; and an allowance ought to be made for their expenses, unless they went about for their own amusement. There was, however, one item which he thought objectionable—namely, 60*l.* for a passage from Gibraltar to Cadiz. Now, this must have been a shabby bishop, for he must have been living aboard ship all the time, instead of going ashore at Cadiz, where there were plenty of hotels. It was impossible that the expenses of the mere passage could have amounted to that sum. He should like to have some explanation of an item of 810*l.* for the travelling expenses of various Sovereigns and Royal personages, during their sojourn in England in the last year.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer quite agreed in the principle laid down by the hon. Member for Coventry and the hon. and gallant Officer, that the Colonial bishops ought to pay for all excursions made for the purposes of recreation out of their own pockets; but the excursion in question did not come within that description. The journey to Lisbon of the Bishop of Gibraltar was rendered necessary, in order that a new church and a burying ground should be consecrated. The charges of entertaining passengers of the rank of bishops, who dined at the captain's table, were fixed at a fair and at the same time a moderate sum, so as to remunerate the officer; but not to enable him to gain anything. As to the question put by the gallant Officer respecting the travelling expenses of the Royal Personages who had visited this country in the course of last year, he must state that it was customary for a Sovereign to defray all charges of guests whilst in his or her dominions; and he was quite sure the gallant Officer would not wish to see the Queen of England placed in a different position in this respect to that of other crowned heads.

Captain Pechell observed a sum charged for the entertainment of Queen Pomare and her Consort when she took shelter on board of the Cormorant, whilst stationed at Tahiti. He wished to know from whom it was that Queen Pomare sought the protection and shelter afforded by the Cormorant?

Sir G. Cockburn said, that Queen Pomare sought a refuge aboard of the Cormorant, when her island and capital were taken possession of by the French.

Mr. Hindley was glad to see the sum referred to by the hon. and gallant Member, on the Votes, as it showed that some sympathy existed in England towards the Queen of Tahiti.

The Committee divided on the Question, that 47,899*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.* be granted:—Ayes 11; Noes 68: Majority 57.

Original Question agreed to.

SUPPLY—RETIREMENT OF NAVAL CAPTAINS.] Mr. Corry rose to propose that the sum of 7,528*l.* should be granted to Her Majesty, for half a year's retired allowance of 300 Captains in Her Majesty's Navy (being the Supplemental Navy Estimate), at the rate of 5*s.* 6*d.* a day to each, beyond the amount of their existing half-pay, 15,056*l.* The right hon. Gentleman said, he felt assured that the explanatory memorandum which had been furnished to them had satisfied the Committee that in the first place it was indispensable that the flag list of the navy should be composed of younger men; and, secondly, that if that were to be effected by means of a retirement, no scheme less extensive than that which he had to propose would be effectual; and he therefore did not deem it necessary to establish the importance of the subject by referring to former history. There were, doubtless, to be found on the present list of flag officers, men who, notwithstanding their advanced age, were yet quite capable of serving with efficiency. Such examples were, however, unfortunately of rare occurrence; and he thought it would be admitted on all hands that it had become necessary that younger men should be brought forward to succeed to the flag than could possibly be the case under the present system. The flag list at present consisted of a hundred and sixty-one officers; of those, forty-six had not served the time necessary to qualify them; of the remaining hundred and fifteen, eleven were between eighty and ninety years of age; fifty-six were between seventy and eighty; forty-two were between sixty and seventy; and six only were between fifty-five and sixty. The youngest admiral was upwards of seventy years of age, the youngest vice-admiral was upwards of sixty, and the youngest rear-admiral upwards of fifty-five. Under the existing system that list of flag officers so composed could only be recruited from the first in seniority on the captain's list. On examining the ages of the first hundred on the captain's list, it appeared that thirty were upwards of seventy years of age; that forty-seven were between sixty and seventy; and only twenty-three under sixty, the youngest being fifty-five years of age. Of the second hundred, eleven were between seventy and eighty; forty-two were between sixty and seventy; and forty-seven were between fifty and sixty, of whom only seven were under fifty-five. Of the third hundred, seven only were under fifty, and none of them would have the slightest chance of the flag until the age of fifty-five. He might here observe that during the war, when the success which attended our arms was to be attributed no less to the energy, activity and enterprise of our officers, than to their skill and ingenuity, the average age at which officers were promoted to the flag was, in 1805, forty-two years, and in 1810, forty-five years. Lord Nelson was a rear-admiral at thirty-nine, and he closed his glorious career at forty-seven. His gallant Friend near him was also a rear-admiral at the age of thirty-nine. At the last brevet the average age was sixty-one, and the evil, instead of diminishing, was increasing, for if a brevet were to take place to-morrow, and included the first fifty officers on the list, the average age would be upwards of sixty-seven. The average age of the first hundred would be sixty-seven, of the second hundred, sixty-two; of the third hundred, fifty-eight; and it was not until they reached the fourth hundred that they would find an average age less than that which would entitle officers to admission to the retirement list. Of the first three hundred captains on the list, only seven were under fifty years of age. When these circumstances were considered, he trusted it would be admitted that the scheme which he proposed was not more extensive than was absolutely necessary. As respected the terms on which it was offered, he hoped that they might be regarded as affording a fair and liberal remuneration, and that they would not be looked upon as inconsistent with economy. Every officer accepting retirement would receive 5*s.* 6*d.* a day in addition to his present rate of half-pay, and to that to which he would become subsequently entitled had he remained on the present active list. The title of rear-admiral should be conferred on the first hundred in the list, and the remainder should be permitted to assume the same title at the period when they would have obtained the flag by seniority, had they continued on the active list. The widows of officers having the honorary rank of rear-admiral were to be entitled to the same pension as if they were the wives of effective flag-officers, and to the widows of the retired officers it was proposed to allow pensions of 110*l.* per annum. Those terms were offered absolutely to all captains of fifty-five years and upwards, not exceeding 300 in number; discretionary power, however, was vested in the Admiralty to extend it to officers between fifty and fifty-five years of age, who were suffering from bodily infirmity. No fresh appointments were to be made until the number should be reduced by death to 100, which number was to be permanently maintained by filling up every vacancy as it should occur. Should 300 officers retire, the effective list would be reduced to 414. To prevent that redundancy the list was to be further reduced, by continuing the system of one promotion for every three vacancies, till it should be reduced to 400, at which number it should be permanently maintained. It was also proposed to apply the same principle of one promotion for every three vacancies to the flag list, till it should be reduced from 161 to 150, at which it should be maintained by continuous promotions. It was not, however, intended that the limitation of the captains and flag lists should interfere with the immediate promotion of officers for gallant and deserving services; but in such cases (as also in the case of general promotion), the lists were again to be reduced to the limited number, by resorting to the restricted promotion. As the number of captains would thus be reduced from 714 to 400, it was only reasonable that a corresponding reduction should be made in the numbers of those in the receipt of the higher rates of half-pay. The 14*s.* 6*d.* list, therefore, would be reduced from 100 to 50, and the 12*s.* 6*d.* list from 150 to 100. That gave the same proportion in the receipt of the different rates of half-pay, whilst the prospects of each were much improved by a nearer approximation to the flag, and increased chances of employment on the reduction of the list; and he regarded it as being scarcely less important than the principal object of the plan, for it was impossible that officers could be qualified for high command without that experience which alone could be gained in active service; and at present the opportunities of employment were so few that since the peace not one-tenth of the number of officers on the list had ever been commissioned at the same time; and out of the seventy-one captains, only ninety-five had served the necessary time to qualify them for foreign employment as flag officers, of whom only six were under forty-five years of age—the average age of those who actually hoisted their flags during the war. This proposed plan of retirement, would give a greater share of employment to every officer remaining on the effective list, whilst it would give it to comparatively young men, which was undoubtedly a great advantage. He had thus attempted shortly to explain the details of his proposed plan of retirement, with the collateral changes on the effective list. He trusted that the terms proposed would prove sufficiently liberal to ensure the reception of the plan; and though, no doubt, there were many old officers on the list who, actuated by the honourable ambition of serving their country, would be unwilling to accept retirement upon any terms on which it could be offered, yet it could not fail to have occurred to them that when the Government had undertaken this extensive scheme, their chances of employment must, to say the least of it, be very much diminished. If the number required should not accept the offer made to them, it was obvious that any small retirement would be of no avail; for it would only impose a burthen upon the country, without any corresponding benefit, and it would become the duty of the Government to consider what other measures could be adopted to secure the efficiency of the flag list. Should the plan prove fully successful, the additional cost occasioned by the retirement of 300 captains would amount, in the first year, to 30,112*l.*; but that amount would annually diminish, till the retired list should be reduced by death to 100, when the permanent charge would amount to something more than 10,000*l.* Against that charge, however, must be placed several reductions of expenditure which the proposed plan would occasion in the active list. The first would be an annual saving of 7,000*l.*, resulting from the limitation of the flag list to 150. A saving of 5,000*l.* would also result from the readjustment of the rates of half-pay, and a further saving of 5,000*l.* would also result, at the end of the 16th year, from the non-promotion of one in three on the 200 officers being removed from the retired list without being replaced. A further saving would also follow from the reduction of the list of flag officers to 150, and the general result of all would be (after a few years) an excess of saving over the cost amounting to many thousands per annum. Feeling confident that the Vote would be agreed to, he would not trespass longer on the time of the House.

Mr. W. Williams opposed the Vote. An actuary would tell the Government that this would really be equivalent to a vote of half a million; it would take that sum to buy such annuities; and already, during a thirty years' peace, the navy had cost on an average 3,500,000*l.* a year. The half-pay of our navy was rather more than the expenditure of the whole naval department of the United States. Had the Government ascertained that 300 captains of fifty years of age would accept the proposition? Only those who had no interest with the men in power would do so. And why not apply the principle to lieutenants and commanders? If this Vote were granted, there would be other claims, though he would do the officers of the army in that House the justice to say, that while those of the navy had been continually pestering the Government for money, the others had never uttered a word of discontent with their condition.

Captain Pechell regretted that any comparison had been drawn between the officers of the two services, and language used tending only to excite animosity between them. The navy did not grudge the army anything it had. The proposed plan was well intended, and the Government were taking a step in the right direction. It would remedy some grievances, of which the hon. Member himself (Mr. Williams) complained. He thought the plan could not succeed, on account of the smallness of the additional pay. The plan being contingent on its acceptance by a sufficient number of officers, he presumed it was still open to revision. Was it intended that officers should forfeit their good service pensions, or give up their salaries as Queen's naval aides-de-camp?

Sir C. Napier, as a naval officer, returned his thanks to the Government for having at last given the navy such a large retiring allowance. It appeared from the very clear statement of the hon. Secretary to the Admiralty that it was utterly impossible for the service to go on in its present state. He did not agree with his hon. and gallant Friend, who had just addressed the Committee as to the disinclination of officers to accept the retiring pay. In point of numbers and amount of money, the plan was as much as the navy had at present a right to expect; but he thought there should be a juster division of the grant, in order to make it more acceptable to the old officers generally. If it were desired to remove the old admirals from the top of the list, they ought to be properly remunerated, or they would not give up their prospects of being appointed to the dockyards or other of our naval establishments. For the purpose of inducing them to accede to the plan, he would suggest that their pay should be 400*l.* a year instead of 364*l.* There was another thing he could not agree to—namely, that the limited list should be gradually reduced by recourse to the principle of promotion. If another promotion, such as that on the birth of the Prince of Wales, should take place, they would have to stop promotion for four years altogether. If the vacancies were regularly filled up, it would be quite sufficient to keep the lists healthy. He thought also when they gave this promotion it ought to include all promotions for meritorious services. When it was said that these were one in three, he should be glad to know in what year that was. With respect to special vacancies, the First Lord of the Admiralty could make them when he pleased. The Paper wound up with a menace which he was sorry to see in a public document. He believed it would be impossible for the Government to make a selection. He wished the Government would take the opinion of the officers as to the relative merits of his and their proposition, and adopt that which they thought most advisable. The hon. Member for Coventry said it would be time enough to do this when we went to war. He said that would be too late, for a sense of honour would then prevent many disabled officers from retirement. However, he thanked the Government for this boon to the service, and all he asked for more was, that they would give it in a manner that would be generally acceptable.

Admiral Dundas considered the sum now proposed sufficient, but regarded the plan as unsatisfactory and abortive. It was said that the admirals' list was very large; but it was smaller by twenty than in 1800.

Sir G. Cockburn said, it was clear, for the reasons stated by the gallant Commodore, that if the list was to be cleared in this manner, it must be done in time of peace. With respect to the sum, it was a difficult thing to settle, some thinking it too much and some too little; but they had endeavoured to fix it at the proper amount as far as they could ascertain it. It remained to be seen how far the proposal would be acceptable to the service. If any other arrangement should be thought better, it would be open to the Government to adopt it. He thought it, however, too much to say that if it were adopted they ought in such cases as that which had lately occurred at New Zealand to be debarred from making special promotions. With respect to the objections made to this great scheme, he did not think them sufficiently important to prevent it. He had laid before the House the general principles on which it was based, but if minor alterations would give more general satisfaction, no doubt they would be made accordingly. He thought the proposition was a very liberal one, and hoped that it would give satisfaction, or at least that it would show the Government were inclined to afford, in time of peace, an honourable pretext of retirement to disabled officers. With respect to the good service pension, it was of course intended, notwithstanding this proposition, that any officer who possessed it should retain it.

Sir R. Peel said, he had well considered the subject, and was of opinion that the retirement of 100 captains, while it would be attended with a loss of money, would be no remedy for the evil. If they did anything, he conceived it would be better to submit to an increased pecuniary loss, and provide an effectual remedy in the retirement of 300 captains. Notwithstanding what had been said about the principle of seniority, he did think that in certain cases the Crown should have the power of availing itself of the services of distinguished men having the confidence of the Crown, irrespective of that principle. As a general rule, he admitted that promotion ought to be by seniority; but if the country was willing to submit to a pecuniary sacrifice, he must put in a claim on the part of the Executive Government, to consider whether an occasional departure from that rule, in such cases as that of Lord Nelson, who died a vice-admiral, might not be admissible, in giving to captains the rank of rear-admiral, and to rear and vice-admirals, that of admiral, accompanying the selection with every precaution, and with every guarantee to the profession of its being made on the ground of merit, and merit only.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed. Resolution to be reported. Committee to sit again.

WASTE LANDS (AUSTRALIA) BILL.] Mr. G. W. Hope moved the Second Reading of the Waste Lands (Australia) Bill. He had some important Amendments to introduce.

Mr. C. Buller objected to the Bill being pressed; he had understood it would not be pressed if objected to, and he could assure the hon. Gentleman it would be resolutely and vigorously opposed in every stage.

Mr. Aglionby said not one, but every interest, was opposed to the Bill. He moved that it be read a second time that day six months.

The House divided on the Question, that the words six months be added:—Ayes 11; Noes 34: Majority 23.

Debate again arising.

Bill read a second time.

The House adjourned at half-past two o'clock.

IRISH GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY—CASE OF JOHN STINTON.] Order of the Day for taking into consideration the Report of the Select Committee (made to the House on the 12th instant), respecting John Stinton, a witness, read.

The Earl of Besborough rose to call the attention of the House to a part of the proceedings before the Committee appointed to inquire into the alleged cases of fraud connected with the Dublin and Galway Railway. It was stated that fraudulent and false names had been signed to the contract deed, and, amongst others, by a person of the name of John Stinton. This appeared to be the case, from the evidence taken before the Committee; and he (the Earl of Besborough) was directed, on the 12th of July, to report the case to the House. On consideration, however, it was thought that this person might make some explanation before the Committee on the Bill with regard to this matter. Such, however, was not the case; he had, therefore, thought it to be his duty to place the matter before the House. Since he had entered the House, doubts had been expressed to him as to whether perjury had been committed or not. The noble Earl then proceeded to read the evidence of John Stinton before this Committee, in which he denied that he had ever passed by any other name in connexion with the Dublin and Galway Railway Company, or that he had signed the deed of the Company more than once. A Miss Golding proved that Stinton had received letters at her residence, which were directed to a person of the name of Mr. Baldron, and that he had always passed in that name in her presence, and had opened the letters so directed. Stinton afterwards admitted that this was true, but denied that he had signed the deed more than once, or had affixed the name of Baldron to it. He admitted also that such a person as Penton did not exist. Mr. Stanley, a most respectable stockbroker, stated that he had seen Stinton, whom he knew as a jobber, sign the contract deed of the Company three times in one day, and that he had changed his dress on each occasion. This struck him as a remarkable circumstance; he could not, however, state whether this person had affixed another name than that of Stinton. Robert Parish, the porter of Crosby Hall Chambers, swore that he knew Stinton as a bootmaker in the neighbourhood, and that, at his request, he had taken in letters for him directed to Penton, which were always opened by Stinton. No person of the name of Penton ever had chambers at Crosby Hall. These were the facts of the evidence to which he wished more particularly to call attention.

The Lord Chancellor suggested that the noble Earl should point out the particular parts of the evidence on which he relied as the ground for prosecution.

The Earl of Besborough handed a copy of the evidence to the Lord Chancellor, and pointed out some particular passages in it, and then proceeded to read again to the House the passages in the evidence to which he had before alluded. He concluded by stating, that he had given notice of his Motion in the terms, that the Attorney General be directed to prosecute the party; but not being a lawyer, he would wish to leave the course to be pursued to the judgment of some of his noble and learned Friends near him.

Lord Campbell said, he would admit that he had not looked into the evidence until after he had come down to the House; but from his experience in criminal prosecutions, he would advise their Lordships to be cautious in adopting any particular course. He had no doubt but that this man Stinton had lied abominably, and that he ought to have been reported to their Lordships; but the question for them to decide was, whether the case admitted of a prosecution for perjury. The witness had told the Committee that he should acknowledge what he had before told them was false, but he added that he would then tell the truth. In a trial for perjury, the whole of the evidence would be laid before the jury; and the learned Judge would tell them, he had very little doubt, that the prisoner had not committed perjury in the eyes of the law, because in his supplemental answer he denied his false statement previously given, and his true statement was received. This principle of taking the entire evidence as one act was carried so far, that in Chancery causes, where a bill and afterwards a supplemental bill were filed, the answers to both were taken as one answer; and if the respondent denied in his second answer what he had stated in his first, he was not considered in law to be guilty of perjury. The case was clearly one which the Committee were bound to report to the House; but perhaps the course which they ought to have adopted was, to report that the witness had been guilty of equivocation; and then, if the shorthand writer's notes were read at the bar of their Lordships' House, no noble Lord would have hesitated about voting that the witness be committed to Newgate for equivocation; and he (Lord Campbell) would certainly have heartily concurred in such a Motion: but he did not think this was a case in which they could persecute for perjury.

Lord Cottenham said that, from what he had heard of the evidence, and the mode in which the witness had explained himself, he confessed he would feel some difficulty in coming to a final decision on the matter; but, if he were not mistaken, he believed the terms of the order which their Lordships would have to make, in a case where a witness had grossly misconducted himself, as this man obviously had done, would leave it to the discretion of the Attorney General to prosecute, if he thought fit so do to. Were the House to give a peremptory order in the matter, it would be tantamount to deciding as Judges in the case without a trial. Under similar circumstances, the Court of Chancery would not take any summary proceedings, but would refer the case to the Attorney General.

Lord Campbell said, while he had been Attorney General, several cases similar to the present were referred to him, and in every instance the orders of Parliament were of a peremptory nature. In the case of Stockdale, who was ordered to be prosecuted for a libel on the House of Commons, the Attorney General of the day very likely thought it a foolish prosecution, but, from the terms of the order, he was compelled to file the information.

The Earl of Wicklow said, there was one point in the case to which he wished to direct the attention of the House. It was, that the Committee had told the witness to take care of what he was about, for if he perjured himself he would be liable to prosecution. No perjury had been committed, he believed, after that; and he thought the caution was intended as an intimation that the House would not prosecute him for what had previously occurred.

Lord Monteagle said, the Committee had reported on the 12th of July, and now, on the 31st of the month, their Lordships were required to come to a decision respecting the charge contained in that Report. There was no doubt but that the case was one which could not be passed over altogether. The offence was clearly a moral perjury, whether it happened to be a legal perjury or not. It was a perjury for the purpose of accomplishing a fraud, and deceiving their Lordships and the other House of Parliament; and such an offence could not be suffered to rest without any notice being taken of it. There was, however, no doubt, even if the individual were less ingenuous than he appeared to be, that he had had since then sufficient time to take himself out of the country; but after, by the recent decision of their Lordships respecting this Railway Bill (the Dublin and Galway), they had punished innocent persons for the faults of others, it would be contrary to every principle of justice were they now to allow one who was really guilty to go scot free. The course which he would recommend was, that the question should be referred to a Committee upstairs for half an hour, with instructions to report to the House what steps were necessary to be taken.

The Lord Chancellor said, he had never seen the evidence until it had been alluded to at the Table. He doubted very much whether they could proceed with a prosecution for perjury, under the circumstances. The witness stated that he had never passed as Baldron; and he afterwards explained what he had meant by that answer in this manner: he said he had often received letters addressed to the name of Baldron; but that he did not think that meant passing by the name. They could scarcely hope to assign perjury on that part of the evidence, with any probability of success. Again, the witness said he did not know Miss Golding; whereas it appeared afterwards that he had asked her to receive letters for him, and that she was the keeper of a public-house. It did not follow, however, that because he had been in the habit of seeing her standing behind the bar in a public-house, and had requested her to keep letters for him, that he should, therefore, know her name to be Golding. He thought the course suggested by his noble Friend (Lord Monteagle) to be the most judicious one they could take, as they ought to pay that mark of respect to the Report of the Committee, no matter what decision they might find it afterwards necessary to come to.

The Earl of Besborough said, he would beg leave to move that the Report of the 12th of July be referred to a Select Committee, with instructions to report to the House what steps it would be necessary to take with respect to John Stinton, reported to the House to have been guilty of perjury.

The Lord Chancellor said, they should allege on the indictment what the perjury was, and select from the evidence the particular passages on which they relied.

Lord Monteagle said, it might be supposed out of doors that the Committee had acted unjustly twards this person.

The Lord Chancellor said, the fact was quite the reverse. He had been himself of opinion that the witness had committed perjury, for which he could be prosecuted, until he came to look into the evidence.

Lord Monteagle said, lest any such supposition might exist, he would beg to read two of the questions and answers that had been given as an instance. In No. 405, the witness was asked, "Do you know William Baldron, silk throwster?—No." And again, in No. 489, the question was repeated, "Do you know William Baldron?—I do."

Motion agreed to.

TITHES COMMUTATION ACT.] Lord Campbell presented a petition on the subject of the commutation of tithes, and said that a very doubtful question existed whether, in cases where tithes had not been paid for many years, they were now really payable or not. Several actions had been brought to decide the point; but they had all proved decidedly abortive, and the Judges were, he believed, equally divided respecting it. It was, therefore, he thought, absolutely necessary that there should be some further legislation on the subject, and the sooner it took place the better. Were it not for this point, he believed tithes would be commuted all over England before the present time.

The Lord Chancellor said, the subject was a very important one; and the conflicting opinions respecting it, only showed how lawyers would sometimes differ. He concurred with his noble and learned Friend, that the Act required some Amendments; and, if the matter were intrusted to his hands during the recess, he would take care to have steps taken respecting it, before the next Session of Parliament.

GREECE.] Lord Beaumont said, he would proceed to put to the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Aberdeen) the question of which he had given notice on a former evening. It might be in the recollection of their Lordships, that when on a recent occasion, he had brought the affairs of Greece under their notice, and had ventured to state that the conduct of the Government at Athens was such as to call for some advice, if not more active interference, on the part of the Allied Powers, he had been met by the noble Earl with an assertion, that affairs in that quarter were not in so bad a state as had been believed; and that nothing had occurred which was of a serious nature. It might also be in the recollection of the House, that when, on the same occasion, he (Lord Beaumont) alluded to the disorganized state of society in the frontier districts of Greece, on the side of Turkey, and added that a regular system of brigandage was carried on by the subjects of Greece in that quarter, the noble Earl replied, by declaring that there had been only one isolated instance of robbery across the border, and that of so unimportant a character as not to deserve comment. He (Lord Beaumont) knew not if the noble Earl was better informed now, than he seemed to be then; for if he was not, he was sadly behind the rest of Europe in knowledge on this subject. The details of numerous incursions, some of which had been attended with bloody consequences, were well known both in London and Paris; the very names of the parties who headed these marauding bands were known, and many of the cases had been given at length in the German papers. While these events were daily occurring on the frontier, a no less disgraceful system was carried on in the interior; the regular forces had been disbanded, and the safety of the country entrusted to the Palikeri; neither order nor justice were respected in the internal administration of the country, and the peaceful continuation of its foreign relations was hourly endangered by the lawless conduct of the border population. Colletti and the Greek Government had taken no steps to put an end to this disgraceful state of things, unless the proclamation which had been issued might be considered as an exception, wherein the Government call on the population of the frontier districts to form themselves into a militia, for the purpose of suppressing the robbers who infest them—a measure which is more calculated to increase than diminish the evils complained of; for when the lawless character of the mountain population is considered, and the disorganized state of society throughout the country taken into account, the proclamation is neither more nor less than an attempt to put down robbery by giving arms to the robbers themselves. An officer named Valenza, of whose appointment to a command on the frontiers he (Lord Beaumont) had on a former occasion complained, had not been removed or reprimanded; although it was known that the noble Earl himself had objected to that officer's appointment, and even gone so far as to instruct Sir E. Lyons to request his removal. He (Lord Beaumont) hoped the noble Earl would be more explicit on the present, than he was on a former occasion; for his words had been actually construed into a positive approval of the Greek Government, and the noble Earl himself was mentioned as an abettor of Colletti. Different interpretations, it was true, had been given in different quarters of the noble Earl's speech; but the general impression in Athens itself had been, that the Foreign Office here was not inclined to cordially support Sir Edmund Lyons in his remonstrances, and the Greek authorities were consequently induced to look entirely to the French Minister for advice or countenance in their proceedings. Now, he (Lord Beaumont) hoped the noble Earl would lay aside his diplomatic reserve, and see the necessity of distinctly stating his sentiments with regard to the Government of Colletti, and no longer let any doubt be entertained of his opinions on the general condition of public affairs in Greece. It was most foolishly, as well as most wrongly considered abroad, that the interests of France and England were at variance both in Greece and Turkey. Nothing could be more erroneous: the interests of the two countries were essentially the same in both quarters—their object was, or ought to be, identical. England and France alike were deeply interested in preserving the independence, integrity, and due influence of the Ottoman Empire, who was and could be the only safe keeper of the Dardanelles; for should the key of that gate be wrenched from her, and the opening and shutting the Dardanelles and Bosphorus be at the discretion of a northern Power, the trade and possessions of England and France in the Mediterranean would be at the mercy of Russia. In the like manner, our interests and those of France were identically the same in the smaller State of Greece. We were both interested in creating there an independent commercial community, totally unconnected with the great political questions which agitated the rest of Europe —a neutral spot in the Levant for the benefit of trade and commerce, and not an arena on which the rival jealousies of the greater Powers might deploy their political intrigues. Although the two countries required the same course of policy to be pursued for their mutual advantage, the Consuls of England and France in the East were generally at variance; and while a single glance at the map would convince any impartial person, that the objects of the two Governments ought to be the same, political parties in the Levant were invariably split into an English and French faction. This state of things must have been caused by the want of energy on the part of the authorities at home, and the consequent neglect in despatching proper instructions to their representatives abroad. Some portion of this unnatural state of hostility between the Consulates of England and France, might be attributed to a disposition on the part of the French Government to flatter the vanity of some of their servants, who sought to enhance their personal importance by arrogating to themselves the exclusive right to protect the Christians in the East. Now, he (Lord Beaumont) maintained, that the Porte should have the sole government of its own subjects; but should the Sultan, in consequence of the interpretation of some ancient or supposed agreement, delegate to the European Sovereigns authority, in certain cases, over those of his subjects who professed the Catholic faith, England should not allow France, or any other Power, to take a position thereby to the detriment of her interests; or permit the Consuls of these Powers to put themselves in advance of ours, on the plea of enjoying exclusively the privilege of protecting the Christians of a single sect. After a few other observations, the noble Lord concluded by putting the question of which he had given notice—namely, whether the Government had received any information of the state of the frontier between Greece and Turkey? And, if so, whether they had taken any steps to induce the Greek Government to adopt measures to prevent the continuation of the disgraceful state of things known to exist there? Also, whether the Government had not sent instructions to Sir Edmund Lyons, requiring him to demand of the Greek Government the dismissal of an officer or person named Valença; and what reply, if any, had been received to such demand?

The Earl of Aberdeen: I am ready to admit, my Lords, that the peculiarity of our relations with Greece may justify the noble Lord in bringing various matters under the attention of your Lordships in connexion with that country, which, under other circumstances, it would not be desirable to do, neither, indeed, would the noble Lord be justified in so doing. In the first place, this country has, in conjunction with France and Russia, created this State of Greece; we not only created it, but we guaranteed its independence and the integrity of its territories. This, therefore, gives us a right to take such precautions as not to render that guarantee more onerous than it necessarily ought to be. We have also guaranteed the payment of the interest of a loan contracted by the Greek State, which we have been called upon to discharge ourselves for the last two or three years. This, therefore, gives us undoubtedly a right to interfere so far in the internal affairs of this State as to see that we should be released from these obligations as rapidly as possible. And the Greek Government would do well to recollect that, by the provisions of the Treaty, we are enabled to enter into possession of such of the revenues of Greece as we think proper for the repayment of the debt so contracted; and they should consider that this is not a vain formality, but a right, the exercise of which must depend on the good faith of the Greek Government itself, and the endeavours they make to discharge the obligations under which they lie. But the noble Lord must recollect that although this is true, as a consequence of the relations in which we stand towards Greece, it may be carried to such an extent as to leave no shadow of independence whatever in the Government of that country. I am ready to admit that the present state of Greece, in many respects, is such as to give pain to all who wish well to the prosperity and welfare of that State. No doubt outrages have been committed; murders, robberies, and violence of various descriptions have been perpetrated, none of which can be compatible with a government of peace and order. I do not feel, therefore, that we are precluded from giving any such counsel and advice as we may think calculated to remedy these internal disorders; but I do not feel that I am called upon to give any opinion of the Government of Coletti, as required by the noble Lord. He may express any opinion which he may think proper; but it is not my province to give any opinion of the conduct of a Minister of a Foreign and friendly State; I give such advice on the part of Her Majesty's Government as we think likely to be useful; and I hope, notwithstanding what the noble Lord has said, that such advice is not without its salutary effect, With respect to what he said of the excesses committed on the frontier, I must repeat that there have been gross exaggerations on the subject. Unfortunately this frontier is inhabited by a race of men imperfectly civilized; and I am afraid I must admit that, if the Cretans are said to have been always liars, I believe the province of Greece has been always inhabited, more or less, by robbers—and this is a robber population. Unfortunately, the acts of which they are guilty are not regarded in the same manner as they would be by more civilized countries; it is a species of warfare which is looked upon almost with the same respect as legitimate warfare. Now, I do not deny that various outrages have taken place on the Turkish frontier, but that they have been carried to such an extent as has been described I utterly deny. On one or two occasions these small predatory bands have crossed over the boundary, and have been dealt with very properly but very severely by the Turkish troops, and several of them have met with what they richly deserved—the most severe treatment. Some of them have also been put to death by the Turkish troops. But to suppose for a moment that the Greek Government would either support or encourage such proceedings as those for the purpose of carrying on aggressions against Turkey, is perfectly incredible. True, they do not repress them, for they have not force sufficient to put them down; but what they are most desirous about, is to remove the overwhelming Turkish force which is assembled on the frontier. But that the Government of Greece, a country without any military force, should endeavour to provoke hostility on the part of the Turkish Empire, is perfectly impossible; and when coupled with the consideration, the declaration of the three protecting Powers of England, France, and Russia, that they would neither tolerate aggression on the part of Turkey on the one hand, nor Greece on the other, if such a notion as that alluded to is entertained by Coletti, or any other Minister in Greece, it would fully qualify him for a place in a lunatic asylum, did any such exist in his country. The noble Lord says that a certain person has been placed in command of the forces on the frontier, who ought not, in the noble Lord's opinion, to be so appointed. It is said that the man alluded to has been remarkable for having taken a conspicuous part in some transactions which occurred four or five years ago, and was mixed up with some excesses which were committed on the Turkish frontier. With respect to this man's appointment to a command also, there is another misrepresentation. I admit that it would have been more desirable not to have employed this man at all; but every one knows the difficulty which all Governments sometimes find in satisfying those parties who have claims upon them. Now, it was thought necessary to give this man an employment; but he is not in the command of any force whatever on the frontier. He is not on the frontier. I understand his command is thirty or forty miles from the frontier. And what is the force which this person commands, who is supposed to inspire terror into the Turkish empire? Why, he commands eighteen men; and they are not soldiers, but a species of local guard—of national and provincial guard. And it so happens—although I agree in the opinion that, considering the notoriety he has acquired, it would have been better not to have employed him at all—but it so happens that he is employed at his own home where he has a small farm, which he occupies and cultivates himself, and which unfortunately happens to be nearer the frontier than could be wished. But that he occupies any post that can excite uneasiness on the part of the Porte, or the friends of the Porte, is really not the fact. I have given such an opinion as I thought I was called upon to give to the Greek Government respecting this person, and other matters connected with the state of the frontier; but I do not think it necessary to state to the noble Lord what these opinions are, or what the result has been. I have taken, and shall continue to take, all such measures as I think prudent and likely to be useful in establishing the tranquillity of Greece; because, after all, it is impossible to conceive that any Government—be it a Government of the worst Ministers possible—should have any interest in promoting a state of confusion, anarchy, and disorder. They may take erroneous means to arrive at the pacification of the country, but that must be their object at last; and, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, I undertake to say, that all such counsels will be given as seem likely to contribute to that result. The noble Lord has said something about English influence at Athens no longer existing, and that French influence is predominant. I am quite surprised that the noble Lord, who knows something of the East himself, should be carried away by these absurd statements. Supposing it is admitted that the Greek Minister is connected intimately with the French Minister, and acts by his advice, what can he do? How can he affect English interests? We have our Treaty with Greece, and that Treaty gives us all the advantages which any State can possess; and is it possible that the Greek Minister could hurt a hair of the head of a British subject, without the most signal redress being executed? What is the meaning of this influence which is spoken of? I say, that influence depends on the acknowledged power and disinterestedness of this Government; that it reposes also on the character of the people with whom they have to deal—the wealth, the probity, and activity of our merchants. And do not ten Englishmen go to Greece for one native of any other State? It is our own fault, then, if they do not derive from their experience of English travellers a better opinion of us than of any other nation. These are the real sources of influence; and I defy M. Coletti or the French Government either, if they wished it, to weaken or destroy English influence in Greece in the only way in which it ought to exist, or in which we ought to desire it to exist. I have not found the slightest diminution of English influence in Greece. Quite the contrary; on every occasion which has arisen, there has been proof that it existed quite as much as we could possibly desire. But, I repeat, it has been the curse of that country, that parties there have endeavoured to create what is called an English party and a French party, or a Russian party; and that they have not thought only of a Greek party, for that is the only party we ought all to unite in supporting. And the Governments do not entertain any such different views of the matter: the whole arises from the over zeal of persons on the spot, and a morbid desire of popularity and of meddling with the affairs of the country. My Lords, I must decline to state more particularly the nature of the advice which I have thought it my duty, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, to give to the Greek Government; but I have before said that, from the situation in which we are placed in relation to Greece, I consider that we are fully justified in that sort of interference which we believe to be necessary for the purposes to which I have alluded.

Lord Beaumont thought the speech of the noble Lord was more satisfactory than that which he had before delivered on the same subject; and he hoped the consequence would be a happier result, which he confidently anticipated from the firm tone which the noble Lord had assumed.

Coal Trade (Port of London) Bill.] The Earl of Dalhousie moved the Second Reading of this Bill.

The Marquess of Londonderry could not allow the Bill to pass without expressing his opinion on the subject. Coal was almost the only article imported into the port of London that was so grievously taxed. In 1840, the city of London gave up the coal tax to the Government. The annual revenue in that year was 125,000*l.*; in 1841, it increased by 20,000*l.*; in 1842, by 10,000*l.*; and in 1843, by 5,000*l.*; in 1844, there was a strike amongst the colliers, and the revenue decreased by 3,500*l.* For the half of the present year, however, it had increased so as to make the average 165,000*l.* from the present tax. As there had been so great an increase, and as it was likely to continue, he wanted to know why it was necessary to put a tax of an additional penny on this necessary of life? and why, too, coals alone were to be taxed for metropolitan improvements? He contended that the noble Earl who had brought the matter forward in the other House, knew nothing of the subject, and that the tax fell upon the coalowner, and not upon the poor or the consumer. The trade was already unjustifiably oppressed; and in a future Session some relief must be given, or extensive ruin would ensue.

The Marquess of Westminster supported the Bill, and thought the proposed improvements in London and its vicinity, effected by means of it, would, on the whole, be highly beneficial.

After a few words from the Earl of Dalhousie, and an explanation from the Marquess of Londonderry, Bill read 2ª.

House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, July 31, 1845.

MINUTES.] [NEW WRIT. For the Stewartry of Kircudbright, v. Alexander Murray, Esq., deceased.

Gladstone, from Charles Miller, for Amendment of Law relating to the Rating of Tithes.—By F. Scott, from Port Phillip, for Separation of that District from Government of New South Wales.—By Mr. M. J. O'Connell, from several places, for Repeal of Charitable Donations and Bequests (Ireland) Act.—By Mr. Hawes, from Talybout, and Amlwch, for Establishment of County Courts.—By Mr. Wyse, from Charles Byrne, for Inquiry.—By Mr. Wyse, from several places, for Encouragement to Mechanics' Institute (Ireland).

CEYLON.] Mr. Tufnell wished to put a few questions on the subject of Ceylon to the Under Secretary of the Colonies, in consequence of the numerous representations that had been made to him, since the debate of Friday last, from the friends and connexions of the civil servants of that Colony; amongst whom the conduct of the Government had produced the greatest anxiety. He asked, first, at what period the six months were to commence, during which the civil servants were to make their election, either to retain their offices or their lands? Whether the term of two years for the disposal of the landed property was definitely settled? And, lastly, which was of the greatest importance, whether civil servants might be allowed to retain their lands, provided they gave up the active management. He hoped that he should receive a definitive answer upon these points; and that, after what had already passed, as little as possible would be left to the discretion of the Governor of that Colony.

Mr. G. W. Hope said, that the civil servants of the Government, in Ceylon, would be afforded the fullest information without delay; and they should have had that sooner but the Governor was obliged to wait until he obtained some detailed information from England. The time of election had been extended from six months to a year, and the time allowed for the disposal of property was fixed at two years. With regard to the third and most important question put by the hon. Member (as it was necessary to wait for some information from Ceylon) still he thought an arrangement might be made which would prove satisfactory to the civil servants. He was happy to add that the dissatisfaction which prevailed at the first issuing of the Minute had much diminished.

Mr. Tufnell felt great satisfaction at hearing the answer of the hon. Gentleman, and he had only to add that he hoped as little as possible would be left to the discretion of the Governor of Ceylon.

Mr. Hope said, he had reason to believe that the dissatisfaction which had been expressed in Ceylon had, in a great degree, subsided.

SLAVE TRADE—BRAZILS.] Sir Robert Peel moved the Order of the Day for receiving the Report of the Slave Trade Brazils Bill.

Mr. M. Gibson wished to make one or two remarks before this stage of the Bill had passed; and in addition to these, he was desirous of putting a question to the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government with respect to the Bill. He had given the measure the fullest consideration, and he had looked to the opinions of those who were competent judges, and he was unable as yet to regard the measure in a favourable light, in any point of view in which he regarded it. It appeared to him very questionable whether, according to international law, they could make the provisions of the Bill binding on Brazilian subjects; and if it were, he did not think that it was calculated to assist the course of policy which we were desirous of carrying out with respect to the Slave Trade. It seemed to him to be a dangerous doctrine to set up proclamations instead of law. It appeared to him to be a dangerous doctrine to make the dictum of the Executive Government—of the temporary advisers of the Crown—equivalent to the effect of law; and he did not think that the subjects of another country ought by such a dictum to be dealt with and punished for a crime which the law and tribunals of their own country had not declared to be a crime. There was no law in the Brazils which declared the Slave Trade to be piracy, and the Government of this country knew that there was no such law. How then could we consistently pass an Act, the object of which was to punish Brazilian subjects to a degree to which they would not be punishable in their own country, and for an offence which the laws of their own country had not declared that they ought to be so punished. Another question arose which it was most desirable to have answered by the Government before they passed this Bill, namely, whether we had power to inflict punishment upon Brazilian subjects for an offence against our laws, they having no such law; and he confessed himself to be still at a loss to understand the explanation which the Attorney General had given on the last occasion when this subject was before the House. The policy of such a course as this appeared to him to be fatal to a good understanding with Brazil, and to be quite opposed to the object with which it was introduced, of inducing in the public opinion of Brazil an opposition to the Slave Trade, and a desire for its abolition, as it was rather calculated to excite hostility in Brazil to our exertions, and become dangerous to the interests of British subjects and to British trade in the Brazils. It appeared to him also that it was calculated to prevent the co-operation of Brazilian subjects in our exertions, which co-operation, it would seem from Papers that had been laid on the Table of the House, might have otherwise been expected, as measures were in progress in Brazil to put an end effectually to the Slave Trade. That was an additional reason why they should have abstained from a measure of such bad policy as this, and he therefore felt it his duty to enter his protest against the measure. He begged now to make the inquiries of which he gave notice. He wished to know whether the Brazilian Minister in this country had addressed to Her Majesty's Government any remonstrance or communication relative to this Bill? If such a communication had been received by the Government, he thought that the House was entitled to see the communication or remonstrance, and that it should be laid before Parliament. He thought that as they were called upon to share in the responsibility of the Executive, the Executive Government should place the House in the same position in which they stood themselves—and should have a full opportunity of judging both of the law and the policy of this measure. He would ask the right hon. Baronet, then, if a remonstrance had been received, and, if it had, whether he could lay it on the Table of the House? If it was received, why should they not delay this measure till they had printed this remonstrance or communication? The Report was brought up on Monday last, and the matter was postponed till this day, and he was not chargeable with that delay. He did think that they should not be acting properly, and that they should not be doing what was required, if they acted without the fullest information. He would conclude by requesting Her Majesty's Government to inform them whether they had received that information.

Sir R. Peel thanked the hon. Member for having given him an intimation of his intention to ask this question. He was quite confident that the hon. Member would not take advantage of the late period of the Session to defeat this measure. It was true that he postponed the Bill on a former occasion, in order to have an opportunity of maturely weighing a suggestion of an hon. Member, by whom no suggestion could be made which would not be worthy of attention. He had postponed the Bill till that day in order to have an opportunity of further deliberation, and having the opinion of the highest authority upon the subject; and he hoped that the delay caused in that manner would not prejudice the measure at this period of the Session. He could assure the hon. Gentleman that he had given the most mature consideration to the Bill; and that, having, in addition to that, taken the opinion of the highest authority on the subject, his opinion remained unaltered with respect to it. According to the opinion of that authority to which he had referred, under the First Article of the Convention of 1826, the Sovereign of this country might consider the carrying on of the Slave Trade, on the part of Brazilian subjects, an act of piracy. The First Article of that Convention was to the effect, that after the expiration of three years, to be reckoned from the exchange of the rati-fications of the Convention between the two nations, it should not be lawful for any subject of the Emperor of the Brazils to be concerned in carrying on the African Slave Trade, under any pretext, or in any manner whatsoever; and that carrying on the Slave Trade after that period, on the part of subjects of His Brazilian Majesty should be deemed piracy, and treated as such. There was not in that Convention any obligation on Brazil to pass a municipal law to make the offence of carrying on the Slave Trade piracy. Carrying on the Slave Trade could not be piracy by international law, as they would see, if they recollected that this country had carried on the Slave Trade at no very remote period. The simple act of carrying on the Slave Trade was not, therefore, piracy by international law; but the carrying on of the Slave Trade had been made by various other countries piracy under municipal law, when that trade was carried on by the subjects of the country so passing the law; and the United States was the first of those countries to which the honour of passing that law belonged. The United States passed a law in 1824, by which the Slave Trade was declared piracy, and the subjects of the United States rendered liable to the punishment of piracy under the municipal law of that country. Thus, the countries which had so made the Slave Trade piracy, under their municipal law, had the power to punish their own subjects for carrying on that trade; and at that time a new description of piracy was created between the United States and Great Britain. Under the Convention with the Brazils in 1826, this country had a right to take cognizance of the carrying on of the Slave Trade by Brazilian subjects subsequent to the year 1830; for under that Convention Brazil declared it to be piracy on the part of the subjects of the Brazilian Government. By the Convention of 1817 with the Brazils, a mutual Right of Search was agreed to; and whilst that was in force, it suspended the Article in the Convention of 1826; but by the abrogation of the Convention of 1817 in 1845, the Article in the Convention of 1826 was brought into full force, and remains now in full force, between this country and the Brazils, the Brazilian subjects who carry on the Slave Trade being, by that Article, declared guilty of piracy. The hon. Gentleman said, that the Brazils had passed no law to make it piracy, and inferred, therefore, that so long as the Brazils passed no law to make the carrying on of the Slave Trade by Brazilian subjects piracy, Great Britain had no right to interfere with them. [Mr. M. Gibson: I said, no right to pass an Act of this kind.] Of what kind? The Government of the Brazils had avowed the fact which this country maintained, that carrying on the Slave Trade was piracy, and had entered into a solemn engagement that all its subjects who were found carrying on the Slave Trade should be held guilty of piracy. If that was not the mode of effecting the recognition of the Slave Trade as piracy, what other mode would they adopt? He relied on the common sense of the House in supporting him in the statement, that unless this country took cognizance, in some way or another, of the carrying on of the Slave Trade by the subjects of the Brazils, the stipulation would be of no use. Piracy was not a crime merely against municipal law; and the hon. Member, of course, knew that, by international law, piracy was punishable by all nations; and when a country, in a Convention, declares an act to be piracy, it gives not to all countries, but to that particular country with which it formed the Convention, in which such declaration was contained, a power to deal with the act so described as an act of piracy. If this country were prepared to take no measure in relation to the Convention, it was quite clear that the Slave Trade might be carried on to an unlimited extent under the Brazilian flag; and, according to the hon. Gentleman's opinion, this country would have no power to interfere. It was impossible to say to what extent the abominable crime of slave trading might be carried on, if Parliament separated without establishing a power to prevent it. He would now refer to the view which the Government of the Brazils took of the power of this country to recognize slave trading on the part of the Brazils. In the year 1829, the Brazilian Minister applied to this country to do away with the Courts of Mixed Commission which were constituted under the Convention of 1817. He made this request on grounds of considerable importance to this question. On the 4th of October, 1830, the Chevalier De Mattos, then the Brazilian Minister in this country, addressed the following letter to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs:—

"Wimpole-street, October 4, 1830.

"The Slave Trade on the coast of Africa being totally forbidden to Brazilian subjects from the 13th of March last, and those who shall hereafter engage in it being liable to punishment, in virtue of the stipulations of the Treaty of the 23rd of November, 1826, by the ordinary tribunals of the two high contracting parties, the Undersigned, &c., has been directed by his Government to concert with that of the King the dissolution of the Mixed Commissions established at Sierra Leone and Rio de Janeiro, now entirely superfluous. In consequence of which, the Undersigned has the honour to request his Excellency the Earl of Aberdeen, &c., to be pleased to take the proper measures for carrying the above resolution into effect, with regard to the Commission at Rio de Janeiro, at the end of the next month of December; and in respect of the other, on the 30th of June, 1831, the term at which all the causes pending in the Commision of Sierra Leone must be completely decided. The Undersigned avails himself, &c.

"The Chevalier DE MATTOS.

"His Excellency the Earl of Aberdeen, &c."

England had already provided that her subjects engaging in this trade should be treated as pirates, and be tried by the municipal law. This letter of the Chevalier, therefore, only amounted to a statement that Brazilian subjects were then placed in the same position; and the words of the Chevalier, "by the ordinary tribunals of the two contracting Powers," directly implied that the Brazilian Government thought it unnecessary then to keep up the Mixed Commission Courts, because the ordinary Courts of Admiralty were sufficient. The Brazilian Government also asked that slave ships of theirs, which might have left the coast of Africa, and were not aware that the Convention had been executed, should be exempted from its operation. The English Government, although averse to allow the Slave Trade to continue one hour longer than was necessary, consented that vessels which had quitted the coast of Africa before the 13th of March, 1830, should be allowed to proceed to any port in the Brazils without being subject to be treated as pirates on their way. On the 4th of November, 1829, the Brazilian Government published a Proclamation stating the result. It ran thus:—

"Notice to the Assembly of Commerce, Agriculture, Manufacturers, and Navigation of the Empire of the Brazils, by a Portaria of the following tenure:—

"The Chargé d'Affaires of this Empire, near the Government of His Britannic Majesty, having succeeded in the measures which had been most earnestly recommended to him by this Secretary of State's Office for Foreign Affairs, in order to obtain a reasonable term for settling the affairs on the coast of Africa, which are still pending, relating to the lawful traffic in slaves, the said Chargé d'Affaires has obtained, by a note of the 16th of September last, from the competent Minister and Secretary of State, the Earl of Aberdeen, the assurance that the British Government was about to issue instructions to the commanders of naval forces, and to the respective authorities, informing them that the Slave Trade, conformably to the agreements existing between Great Britain and Brazil, shall be lawfully continued by the subjects of this Empire on the coast of Africa, until the 13th of March, 1830; and, consequently, that those Brazilian vessels, employed in that traffic, which can prove that they have finally left the coast of Africa on or before that period, shall prosecute and finish their bonâ fide voyages direct from Africa to any port in the Brazils, without incurring the liability of being treated as pirates, according to the Convention, notwithstanding their being met with at sea after the said period of the 13th of March, 1830. His Majesty the Emperor ordains, that this notice be communicated by the said Secretary of State's Office for Foreign Affairs to the Assembly of Commerce, Agriculture, &c., in order to give it due publicity.

"Marquis of ARACATY.

"Rio Janeiro, November 4, 1829."

This was sufficient proof that the Brazilian Government knew that their vessels were liable to be treated as pirates if found at sea after the 13th of March, 1830. The construction put on the Convention by the British Parliament was precisely similar. The power of the Vice Admiralty Courts over such acts of piracy had been superseded by the Courts of Mixed Commission, and this Bill contained a clause to remove any restriction of the jurisdiction of the Vice Admiralty Courts by the Convention; it gave to the Vice Admiralty Courts that power which Lord Stowell was of opinion they ought not to have in cases of piracy, and it also declared they were to have that power. They did not ask for any unnecessary power—they merely declared a power to deal with property, not to deal criminally in those cases with Brazilian subjects, and there was, he could assure the hon. Member, nothing inconsistent with the law of nations in the Bill as it stood. The choice was, in fact, between treating the Slave Trade, carried on by the Brazilians, as piracy, or permitting the Brazilian Slave Trade to be carried on to an unlimited extent, or the Brazilian flag from being used by others for the purpose of carrying on the Slave Trade. He should have thought, on the part of the Government and the Crown, that they were grossly neglecting their duty towards the House if they had not made this proposition. When he recollected the addresses which, within the last few years, had been unanimously presented by the House to the Crown, urging it to enforce, by every means at its disposal, existing stipulations with respect to the Slave Trade, he should have thought the Crown and the Government guilty of great neglect towards the expressed wishes of the House if they permitted Parliament to separate without demanding from it merely this, that the jurisdiction of the Vice Admiralty Courts, which had been destroyed by Parliament, should be re-established, when the necessity for their re-establishment had arisen. He had the strongest confidence that this Bill was in conformity with the principles of the law of nations, whilst it was the mildest measure to which they could resort, in order to claim from the Brazilian Government the performance of the stipulations entered into by this country with that Government, not to further the commercial prosperity of this country, but contracted with a view to the interests of humanity, and for the purpose of throwing difficulties in the way of a traffic which constituted the greatest existing blot on civilized nations. With respect to the question put to him by the hon. Gentleman, the Brazilian Minister did, on Monday last, present a protest against this measure. The hon. Gentleman asked him to lay this protest before the House. He certainly could not permit the document, which had been received by his noble Friend, to be an obstacle in the way of passing this measure, on the necessity of which they were nearly all agreed. He was unwilling also to present the protest referred to, without, at the same time, presenting the answer to it. He trusted, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman would be contented with the assurance that these documents would be included in the whole correspondence, which, when in a complete state, would be laid before the House, and that the hon. Gentleman would not seek to avail himself of his willingness to give the information sought for as a reason why there should be any delay with regard to the present measure. He trusted, that the Brazilian Government would soon permit us, as Portugal had done, by entering into a Convention, giving a mutual Right of Search, to repeal the present Treaty between the two Powers, and revive between them, instead thereof, something in the nature of a mutual Right of Search.

Report brought up.

Sir R. Peel moved an additional clause.

On the Question that it be read a second time,

Mr. Hutt said, he looked upon this Bill as of an important character, and as a measure dealing with a very difficult and delicate subject. If it should hereafter appear, that we had not a sound and legal basis for our proceedings, difficulties should arise from this measure, and they be referred for adjustment, as other difficulties had been, to a foreign Sovereign, if that foreign Sovereign should decide that we were in the wrong, he was sure that such a result would be contemplated by every one in that House with feelings of the deepest regret. He doubted very much, if we were not proceeding, in regard to this measure, somewhat too fast. When the right hon. Baronet stated, that persons of the highest legal authority concurred with him in the view which he had taken of the Treaty of 1826, he very much doubted whether the right hon. Baronet had good ground on which to stand; and if he had not known that the views which he entertained were the views of men better qualified than he was to judge upon the subject, he would not have ventured to say a single word upon the present occasion; but, fortified as he was with the opinions of others, whose opinions he thought entitled to deference and respect, he would venture to suggest whether we might not now be proceeding rather precipitately. The right hon. Gentlemen called their attention to the First Article in the Treaty. There were two points in that Article. The first was, that the two countries should consider the Slave Trade as unlawful; and the second, that Brazilians engaged in that trade should be deemed and treated as pirates. He should have supposed that the natural construction of this Article was, that those found so employed should be deemed and treated by their own Government as pirates, subject to the penalties laid down by their own municipal laws. The executive authorities of the two countries entered into this Treaty. If, by such a Treaty, the subjects of Great Britain, engaged in piracy, should be handed over to the Brazilian Government, to be dealt with according to Brazilian laws—[Sir R. Peel: This Treaty was a marked and peculiar one. It was a unilateral Treaty. It did not make British subjects punishable for piracy. The First Article provided that Brazilian subjects engaged in the Slave Trade should be deemed guilty of piracy.] He was well aware that such was the nature of the Treaty. But suppose we had undertaken to hand over our own subjects concerned in the Slave Trade to the authorities of the Brazils, to be dealt with according to their laws. Now, by the laws of most countries, he believed that piracy was made punishable with death. By a recent Act of the British Legislature, they had, in certain cases, remitted capital punishment as the penalty for piracy. Were they prepared to contend that the British Crown, the executive authority of this country, could hand over a British subject to the Brazilian authorities, to be subjected to penalties in the Brazils, which the laws of his own country would not permit the Government to enforce against a British subject? But if they permitted the Brazils to treat British subjects concerned in the Slave Trade as pirates, and if the municipal laws of that country should be allowed to pronounce against them as such the penalty of death, the Government would then be doing nothing more nor less than handing over British subjects to undergo, in another country, such penalties as the Legislature of their own country had declared that they were not liable to. The Government, by this Bill, asserted a right to treat, to a certain extent, in like manner the subjects of the Brazils in this country—a right which they could not possess in regard to Brazilian subjects, unless they could confer the same upon the Brazils in regard to British subjects. If the constitution of this country conferred upon them the power of thus handing over British subjects to be dealt with according to Brazilian laws, although those laws should conflict with the laws of their own country, it was a subject which deserved their deepest consideration. Such a power appeared to him in every way repugnant to a constitutional government. Lord Aberdeen stated that he was prepared to enforce the law against the persons of Brazilian subjects engaged in the Slave Trade, treating them as pirates. The right hon. Baronet did not ask such a power, and seemed to doubt very much whether he had any ground for making such an appeal to Parliament, and whether such a power would be conformable to the provisions of the Treaty. He regarded the present measure as in every respect a pernicious one, and as a measure by which, instead of securing, we should defeat our own objects. We should have called upon the Brazilian Government to pass a law dealing with the Slave Trade as piracy. If they had refused to pass such a law, Great Britain might have treated their refusal as a casus belli. He felt assured that this Bill would effect no good whatever, and that the attempt to check in this way the Slave Trade, would only aggravate the evils which we were so anxious to eradicate.

Captain Pechell thought that this Bill introduced a new principle in dealing with all vessels equipped for the Slave Trade, and which were to be adjudicated upon by our Vice-Admiralty courts.

Clause read a second time and added to the Bill; to be reprinted and read a third time.

GAMES AND WAGERS.] The Games and Wagers Bill was read a third time.

Mr. Hume moved an addition to the 13th Clause, that costs should be allowed to informers, as between attorneys and clients, in all actions that were suspended under the operation of this Bill.

Bill passed.

WASTE LANDS (AUSTRALIA). On the Motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to resolve itself into a Committee on the Waste Land Australia Bill,

Mr. Hawes observed that the Bill seemed to proceed on the assumption that there was a redundancy of convict population, and that it was necessary to find profitable employment for them. How was it that a Colony with so much redundant labour, and having such abundance of good land, should be in a state of distress? How could they account for this anomaly? And what was the remedy here proposed? The repeal of an Act of Parliament, the policy of which nobody had ever questioned. It was the most unnecessary piece of legislation he had ever seen. It stood self-condemned, and if he could get a seconder, he would divide against the Bill. He moved that the House will on this day month resolve itself into the said Committee.

Mr. Warburton would second the hon. Member.

Mr. Robert Scott supported the measure, which, he said, was brought forward to assist a most deserving class of persons in a distant Colony. The opposition had arisen from the monopolising jealousy of the New Zealand Company.

Mr. Hume said, the present measure had nothing whatever to do with New Zealand. He should vote against the Bill, and condemned the policy of the Government towards our Australian Colonies, as calculated to retard the prosperity of those Colonies, and stop emigration.

Mr. Pakington supported the Bill, and urged upon the Government the necessity of providing more effectual religious instruction for the emigrants. The Government had granted 30,000*l.* for religious instruction in New South Wales; but that was not sufficient, while in Port Phillip and other distant settlements no means existed for the relief of religious destitution. He thought some portion of the funds derived from land sales should be devoted to the purposes of public worship and religious instruction in those distant Colonies.

Mr. G. W. Hope defended the Bill, the effect of which would be to provide profitable employment for the redundant labour of the Colony. Six thousand convicts had been employed at the charge of this country, in works of irrigation and other public works, by which the value of the lands in the Colony had been increased; and it was no more than common justice, therefore, that in the benefit derived from the sale of the waste lands, the means of reimbursing ourselves for that outlay should be allowed. Another advantage which would result from the measure was, that it would give to the stockholders of New South Wales a tenure on better terms than that they now enjoyed. With regard to the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Mr. Pakington), he could assure him that the Government was as anxious as he could possibly be to provide for the spiritual destitution of the inhabitants of these Colonies; but they felt that if to effect that object they proceeded in opposition to the feelings of the colonists, they would do more harm than good.

Mr. Milner Gibson would support the Amendment were it pressed to a division. The Government would not allow the settlers to bring their produce to the best market. As to the speech of the hon. Member for Droitwich, he thought it was very much out of place. It was food and clothing that the settlers wanted rather than spiritual instruction.

House went into Committee.

On Clause 12,

Mr. Hawes protested against the Bill, which was in the teeth of their Governor's recommendations, and inefficient in itself. They were going to great and unwarrantable expenses for the sake of their convict population, at the time that they would not open to the produce of the Colony the only market accessible to it.

Sir James Graham said, that the convicts had been employed at the expense of this country in cultivating lands in the Colony. These lands had afterwards been sold, one half of the proceeds being devoted to the promotion of emigration. As, however, the supply of labour had began to exceed the demand, it was now proposed to devote the produce of the sales to the expenses of the Colony, with a view of reducing the general taxation in this country.

The clauses agreed to.

The House resumed.

On the Motion that the Report be brought up,

Mr. Villiers said, that were the Government to resolve upon a measure admitting Australian corn into this country, he was sure that his hon. Friend the Member for Lambeth would withdraw his opposition to the present Bill. Considering the great change which had come over the opinions of country gentlemen, he did hope that they would make some demonstration of their readiness to acquiesce in so reasonable a measure.

Bill reported.

THE LATE FIRES IN QUEBEC.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose to move the Address of which he had given notice, praying that Her Majesty would grant a sum not exceeding 20,000*l.* for the relief of the sufferers by the late fires at Quebec. In moving a Resolution to this effect, he was sure that he would only be doing that which would be strictly in unison with the feelings of the House. He need not attempt by any powers on his part to induce them to perform an act of kindness and of policy to which he was sure they would be most ready to assent. The calamity with which they had to deal was one of a most extensive nature. He was unable to give to the House those details which must be so interesting to all who were disposed to concur in the Resolution he was about to move, but the facts of which he was aware were these:—On two several occasions—on the 28th of May, and again on the 28th of June—fires broke out in different places in Quebec, the conflagration on the first occasion lasting from eleven o'clock in the morning until ten o'clock in the evening; on the other from twelve o'clock at night until eight o'clock the next morning. And although he did not know how many dwellings had been destroyed by the two calamities, yet with respect to the last of them he was informed that upwards of 1,200 houses had fallen a prey to the flames. And as the duration of the second fire was about the same as that of the first, he presumed that they could not expect that any smaller number of houses were upon the occasion of the first unfortunate occurrence destroyed. They were also aware that the fires took place in that part of Quebec inhabited by a poor and labouring population, and, therefore, the sufferers were those who were least able to provide for themselves the means of repairing the calamity which had fallen upon them, and which had entailed the loss of great part of their little property, leaving them in a state of the greatest destitution. He was happy to state that every possible exertion had been made upon both occasions by the troops stationed at Quebec, and by the officers commanding them, in order first to arrest the flames, and then to afford succour to the sufferers. There was but one feeling of zeal and interest displayed by the military, and he believed that it was mainly owing to their unremitting exertions that the calamity had not proved more extensive than it did. Every effort, too, he was bound to say, had been made by all persons in authority to afford relief to the sufferers, in providing for those who found themselves homeless, some temporary accommodation. The Governor of the Colony had come forward with the view of providing shelter for the unfortunate persons in question; and he felt, upon an occasion of this sort, independent of the calls of humanity, that it was most consistent with good policy to show that when our fellow subjects proceeded to distant Colonies they were not forgotten, but that if they were exposed to any sudden calamity, not only did we in this country as individuals sympathize with and strive to aid them, not only did the Crown feel the deepest interest in the alleviation of the calamity, but that Parliament was ready and willing to take the earliest opportunity of coming forward, and marking their sense of the suffering endured, by the means they were prepared to adopt for its relief. He begged to move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to take into consideration the Resolution which he was about to submit, on which to found an Address to Her Majesty, praying that she would be graciously pleased to direct that a sum not exceeding 20,000*l.* should be apportioned for the relief of the sufferers at the recent fires in Quebec.

Resolution to be reported.

LAW OF SETTLEMENT.] Mr. W. H. Bodkin, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the laws relating to the settlement of the poor in England and Wales, begged permission to state shortly the objects which he had in view, more in the hope that the House would permit him to bring in his Bill, and thus enable him to have it printed and circulated throughout the country during the recess, than with any hope of being able to proceed further than the present stage at present. He did not propose, as was contemplated by the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary, to make any alteration in the present Law of Settlement. His object was to mitigate, if not to remove entirely, two very serious and very pressing evils which were found to exist under the present administration of the Poor Laws, in so far as the removal of paupers was concerned, and likewise in regard to the adjudication of disputed settlements. Under the present law a great deal of unnecessary hardship was inflicted by the immediate removal of persons from a parish to which they became chargeable by reason of sickness, accident, or other sudden and inevitable dispensations of Providence. It was very hard upon such persons to be compelled to see their little households broken up, and themselves and their families transported to a distant part of the country, in consequence of their becoming temporarily chargeable to the parish; and, moreover, he must point out that the evil was not all on one side, for a great and often an unnecessary expense was incurred by the parish in enforcing such removals. The Bill which he supposed to lay on the Table provided against both these evils, by enacting that no person circumstanced as he had described should be liable to be removed to his or her place of settlement until relief should have been continuously given to them for a certain specified number of days after the sickness or accident by which they had been rendered chargeable, should have ceased or have been remedied. The Bill of the right hon. Baronet did contain a proposition by which it was to be enacted that no widow who became chargeable by her husband's death should, be removed to her place of settlement until twelve months had elapsed since the death of her husband; he proposed to introduce that provision into his Bill, and to make such removal likewise contingent upon the consent of the widow being obtained. The next provision which he proposed to introduce into the Bill would remedy a most enormous and growing evil, which prevailed to a very serious extent under the present Poor Law. When the magistrates at quarter sessions had decided upon the evidence of parties before them, as to the place of settlement of persons chargeable to the parishes within their jurisdiction, those decisions came under the cognizance of the Court of Queen's Bench by appeal from the quarter sessions, and it was found that in consequence of technical objections, and without any reference to the merits of the case, or the real and substantial justice of the magistrates' award, these quarter sessions' decisions, in four cases out of five, were upset and reversed by the Court of Queen's Bench, thus entailing a useless, as well as a very heavy expense upon the ratepayers. What he proposed to do in order to put an end to a practice so ruinous was, to constitute a referee under this Bill, who should be a barrister of a certain standing, and who should be empowered to take evidence, to examine witnesses, and to decide upon the legality of the quarter sessions' decisions in cases of disputed settlement, due regard being had to the justice of each case, and technical points being overruled and set aside. He did not propose to alter in any degree the present Law of Settlement, or to make any change in the mode of proving the settlement; all he sought to effect was, to put a stop to the present system of allowing technical objections, instead of the real merits of each case, to govern the decision of the Judge to whom the appeal against the decision at quarter sessions was referred; and, having thus explained the objects which he had in view, he begged to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the laws relating to orders for removal of the poor to their places of settlement, and the trial of appeals against such orders.

Sir J. Graham was sure that the House and the country would be greatly indebted to his hon. and learned Friend, who was a gentleman of great experience and legal knowledge, for devoting his time and abilities to a matter of such great importance, not only to the poor, who suffered extremely from removal, but also to the country generally, to whom these removals caused great expense. He should readily give his most anxious attention to the measure. The fact that it had emanated from his learned Friend, was a proof that it would embrace a great practical knowledge of the subject, and that it would conduce to an early and satisfactory arrangement of the question. The Law of Settlement as it at present stood was, he thought, most injurious and unsatisfactory; but he knew that the greatest possible difference of opinion existed as to the means which should be adopted for amending it. He himself could not, of course, propose any amendment which in his conscience and judgment he did not think would be effective. In his opinion, parochial settlements, small township and parish settlements, were the very root of the evil; at the same time, he knew that many persons believed, on the contrary, that it would be nothing less than sacrilege to interfere with those small settlements. However, he should be most happy to attend to the measure now introduced, which was limited to the subject of removal, though, in his opinion—and he thought it would be found so at last—the Law of Settlement was so intimately blended with the law of removal, that they could not come to a satisfactory arrangement of the one without including the other. He could not at present state what measure he might consider it his duty next Session to adopt; but, in the mean time, he certainly promised his hon. and learned Friend, that the measure before them should receive his careful perusal and best attention

Bill read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. From Presbytery of Kelso, against any Change in the Existing Tests (Scotch Universities).—From Robert Kellie Douglas, Registrar of the Borough Court, Birmingham, against Small Debts Bill.

GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY (DUBLIN TO GALWAY) BILL.] The Earl of Besborough presented the Report of the Select Committee appointed to examine the evidence taken before the Select Committee on the petitions of James Pym (presented to the House on the 7th and 8th of July), and to report what steps (if any) it might be necessary to take in the case of John Stinton, reported to have been guilty of perjury. The Report stated that the Committee had met and considered the subject, and the result they had arrived at was, that, although it was manifest to the Committee that John Stinton had wilfully contradicted himself, and been guilty of equivocation in his evidence given before the Select Committee on the petitions of Mr. Pym, respecting the Dublin and Galway Railway Bill, still they were, on the whole, of opinion that it was not expedient to direct a prosecution against the said John Stinton, by means of an indictment.

The Duke of Wellington asked whether the Committee recommended the adoption of any other course?

Lord Campbell observed that the Committee was unanimous in the adoption of the Report. It should be recollected that, although it was not deemed expedient to direct a prosecution for perjury to be instituted, still the House might, if it thought proper, punish this person, by fine and imprisonment, for misconduct in equivocating in the evidence he gave before a Select Committee of this House. The Report was then laid on the Table.

Incorporation of Companies Bills.] On the Motion of the Marquess of Lansdowne, the following Standing Order was adopted:—

"That when in any Bill to be hereafter introduced into this House for the Purpose of establishing a Company for carrying on any Work or Undertaking, the Name of any Person or Persons shall be introduced as Manager, Director, Proprietor, or otherwise concerned in carrying such Bill into effect, Proof shall be required before the Standing Order Committee (when the Bill shall be referred to that Committee, or before the Committee on the Bill in any other case) that the said Person or Persons have subscribed their Names to the Petition for the said Bill, or to a printed Copy of the said Bill as brought up or introduced into the House."

Bills of Exchange Bill.] On the Motion of the Earl of Dalhousie, Bill read 3ª.

Lord Monteagle expressed his opinion that the Bill ought to be made permanent. He referred to the evidence which had been given before their Lordships' Committee on the Usury Laws, in order to show, from the evidence given by merchants and traders, by solicitors and professional men, and by persons connected with the Court of Bankruptcy, that the opinion of all these parties, after eleven years' experience of the usury laws, was favourable to a relaxation of those laws, on the ground that they were found to press very heavily upon the poorer class of traders. In passing the Annuities Acts, they had already relaxed the usury laws; and the State also always took care that they should not be applicable to itself in time of war, though they were maintained against private individuals endeavouring to borrow money. If there were any one fact connected with the subject proved more clearly than another, it was that these laws pressed most injuriously on the poorer classes. It could not possibly be supposed that the country had not made up its mind on this matter before the present time. There was, in fact, no difference of opinion upon it among the best informed persons, and he could not, therefore, see why the Bill should not be continued for more than five years. He would, under these circumstances, beg to move that the words "to be continued until the 1st of January, 1851," be expunged from the recitement, for the purpose of inserting the words, "that the said recited Act shall be made perpetual."

The Earl of Dalhousie said, he would for the present avoid entering on any general discussion of the question. Although a partial suspension of the usury laws was certainly recommended in the Report to which the noble Lord had alluded; still he did not think their Lordships were in a position now to take so great a step as to vote for the entire repeal of those laws. He thought such a change ought not to be made without the most thorough and searching investigation, both before that and the other House of Parliament, and he felt obliged, therefore, to vote against the Motion of the noble Lord. But though the Bill was to extend for only five years, there could be no reason for supposing that the state of the usury laws might not be modified to any extent within that period, if the wisdom of Parliament should think fit to take any step on the subject pending the operation of this law. If his noble Friend, or any other noble Lord, should think fit to move for an investigation into the state of the usury laws, no opposition would certainly be offered by the Government. He trusted, therefore, that their Lordships would not agree to the Amendment.

The Marquess of Lansdowne said, that having been the Member of their Lordships' House who had the honour of presiding over the Committee appointed to investigate the subject of the usury laws, he had felt it to be his duty, when the Report had been presented, to move that those laws be relaxed; and he now thought that the period had arrived when suspending laws ought to be got rid of altogether. On the occasion to which he alluded he was told—"Let us see the effect of this relaxation; the proposition is something new, and we have a right to know the working of it. If we find that there is nothing wrong in this measure that you propose, we shall be prepared to vote with you for doing away with those laws altogether." They had now abundant experience of the evil of those laws, and of the positive good which a repeal of them would produce; and, under these circumstances, reiterating the opinion which he had formerly expressed, and which he now saw entertained by others, he entirely concurred in the Motion of his noble Friend.

The Earl of Ellenborough said, that having been also a Member of the Committee alluded to, he felt bound to express his concurrence in the opinion that the suspension of the usury laws would prove very salutary in time of peace; but they had never yet been subjected to the trial of a period of war. If his noble Friend opposite (Lord Monteagle) had substituted the words "1846" or "1847," for "1851," he would have voted with him, as he could not conceive any grounds whatever for fixing the period of suspension of these laws at five years. It should be borne in mind by all who were in the habit of dealing in money, that it was impossible to allow individuals to compete with the Government in time of war, or otherwise the public debt would increase to such an amount in a few years as to endanger the safety of the Constitution.

Lord Monteagle said, the noble Earl had misunderstood his meaning. He did not think that in order to guard against inconveniences to the State, they should place a bar in the way of individuals borrowing money. It was clear that if they waited for years before legislating on the subject, they could not expect to add to the weight of evidence which was already before Parliament respecting it. But whatever variety of opinion might exist on the matter, it was clear that a continuance of the law for five years was the most indefensible of all. He should therefore feel obliged to press his Motion to a division.

Lord Wharncliffe said, he did not feel himself at present prepared to make this Bill perpetual. He thought that the wiser course to adopt would be to suspend the check for a short time, until they could institute farther inquiry on the subject.

The Earl of Wicklow said, he agreed fully with his noble Friend (Lord Monteagle) in principle, and he would vote with him if the proposition of his noble Friend near him (Lord Wharncliffe) were that the suspension was to extend for five years and then to cease; but as the Bill would clearly lead to further inquiry, he thought they ought to allow it to pass.

The Duke of Wellington said, he thought the period of five years ought to be adopted, in order to prevent the inconvenience which might result from fixing on a short period. Of course care should be taken to bring the subject under consideration within a given time, so as to have the matter prepared for some final decision upon it.

Bill passed.

COMMONS' ENCLOSURE BILL.] Lord Stanley, in moving that the Report on the Commons' Enclosure Bill be received, said, that the Amendments which he proposed to introduce into this Bill, all originated from the discussion that had taken place upon the Bill in Committee. The most material alteration which he had to propose, was to take away the discretionary power vested in the Commissioners under the 17th Clause. The other Amendments were the proviso with regard to equalizing assessments, and the insertion of a proviso prohibiting the erection of any building to be used for the purpose of a dwelling-house in any of these field-gardens. It was proposed to have a limitation with respect to buildings for holding or feeding cattle.

Report received.

Buller, from Attorneys and Solicitors of Wellington, and a great number of other places, for Removal of Courts of Law and Equity to Inns of Court.—By Mr. Cobden, from Stockport, for Diminishing the Number of Public Houses.

London and York Railway.] Viscount Courtenay moved the consideration of the Report of the Committee on the London and York Railway.

Mr. Ward rose, pursuant to notice, to move, that the Bill be recommitted. It was with great pain that he ventured to trouble the House upon the present occasion to reconsider the decision that had been come to with respect to the present measure. It was hardly possible at any time to induce the House to reconsider a decision of any kind, and that difficulty was greatly increased in dealing with the decision of a Committee that had sat for no less than seventy-three days; under such circumstances nothing would have induced him to appeal to the House, except a conviction that he had one of the strongest causes that was ever brought before the House. If the Committee had had time to hear all the parties concerned, nothing would have induced him to have brought forward the subject. He admitted that the Committee had been most persevering in its labours, but it had done great injustice to several parties, and had come to most improper decisions, without hearing facts; and adjudicated upon the rights of parties, without hearing the parties themselves. The Report itself bore evident marks of the pressure which the Committee felt, to get through the task imposed upon it at the present period of the Session. He appeared there to argue the claims of the York and North Midland, the Midland Counties, and the Eastern Counties Lines, which had been decided without those parties having been heard. He was told that it was a difficult matter to dispute with a great trunk line, such as the London and York; but the other lines had a right to consider themselves a great trunk line, and they had so considered themselves. They expected to be allowed to show the Committee that they could effect a communication with York, at a saving of a million and a half. If they could show this, and they could prove that they had already nearly two-thirds of the line constructed, he hoped that the House would see the propriety of recommitting this Bill. They were at first admitted to form a competing line even by the Committee, for in the first instance, when the counsel for the Hertford and Biggleswade, and on a subsequent day Mr. Austin, for the Eastern Counties Company, made an application stating that he should satisfy the Committee that they were a distinct and competing party, and that, if excluded, they should be debarred from examination of witnesses pro formâ, the Committee decided that the Eastern Company's scheme should be admitted into Court, and its counsel be entitled to all the privileges of examining witnesses. [Mr. Darby: Does that extend to the general principle of competing lines?] The hon. Member for Sussex asked him if that extended to the general principle of competing lines? Why, that hon. Member himself said, that they might be considered so, but said that in their examinations they must be sure to confine themselves to what had been alluded to in the first examination. The Committee having thus decided, the Companies he represented expected that they should be considered competing lines in the fullest extent, and when, before the decision had been given on the preamble, the counsel applied to the Committee that they might be allowed to blend the main evidence of the competing lines as against the London and York line, with the object of saving the time of the Committee, the request was complied with. This Resolution was dated the 7th of June, but he found that it was not acted upon throughout; and he begged to call the noble Lord's attention to this fact, that that proposition and the Resolution were materially altered in the Report. [Lord Courtenay: What date do you say?] The 7th of June. Application was afterwards made to the Committee to ascertain what course they would wish to have pursued with regard to the rebutting evidence. He found, on examining the Reports, that the Committee ordered that landholders and the other opponents should be heard after; and he held in his hand a Resolution which was not to be found in this Report. The Resolution passed by the Committee was such as might have been acted on by all parties; but the next was of a very modified character. On applying to the shorthand writer for a copy of it, he found that the Resolution stated, that the landlords were to be heard next in order, but that the Committee would offer no objection to the course of blending the evidence against the London and York; and Mr. Hildyard stated, that he had arranged his case so as to class the rebutting evidence together, and the other competing lines had agreed to that course. This case was decidedly agreed to by the Committee themselves. Now, the first intimation they had of an intention to decide upon the preamble was on the 12th of July; and then the counsel and the parties in support of the three competing lines objected, on the ground that they had not been heard. This objection was overruled by the Committee on the 14th of July. Now this decision they complained of, because they had never been heard. There were great advantages in the line from London to Biggleswade for bringing the manufactures of the north to the river terminus, which would be constructed in the course of the next three months. It was thought that all the parties concerned were judicially entitled to be heard: instead of that, however, a hearing was refused, and the Committee voted that the preamble of the London and York line was proved, in order to shut out all evidence from the other parties. Such was not the case with the Committee, of which the hon. Gentleman opposite was the Chairman. Before that Committee there were three lines submitted between Portsmouth and London. Evidence on all of them was heard; and at last the Committee, after having maturely considered all of them, decided on that line which they thought most conducive to the public interests. In the noble Lord's Committee, the practice was altogether different. On the 16th of July another application was made to the noble Lord by Mr. Talbot, on the part of the Eastern Counties line, to be heard; and the application was overruled by a resolution, which was distinctly opposed to that passed on the 7th of June. Evidence was again tendered on the 9th of July to the Committee, by Mr. Wells, on behalf of the Eastern Counties line, with respect to the river terminus; and again this application was rejected. They did not take one tittle of evidence on the importance of effecting a communication with the Thames at Blackwall, and yet the Committee attached the greatest importance to the terminus of the London and York line. When the application was made to be heard, the Chairman told the counsel that it was an extremely proper application, but that the Committee could not entertain it. Even in the Report, as regarded the London and York scheme, it was clear the Committee had heard sufficient rebutting evidence to give it clearly and fully. None of the rebutting evidence of the Direct Northern and Cambridge and Lincoln lines had been heard; and this evidence was necessary, in order that the whole bearing of the entire scheme might be properly sifted and adjudicated upon, and thus nearly the whole of the important part of the project was altogether shut out. If the opposing lines had received fair play, the traffic evidence of the London and York Railway would have been materially altered. This evidence was got up in so absurd and extraordinary a manner, that the noble Lord thought proper to tell the promoters of the London and York line, that the Committee could not receive their evidence as to the coal traffic as it then stood. In consequence of this hint, the amount expected to be derived from the coal traffic was reduced from 300,000*l.* to 170,000*l.* per annum. If the competing lines had insisted at an early period of the case on producing rebutting evidence, it would, perhaps, have been differently decided. He would appeal to the House, whether or not the case of the London and York line was ripe for decision at the present time? He contended that the Committee had come to a decision with imperfect data, and with an insufficiency of facts. On Lord Lindsay's estate, the Peterborough line had already been sanctioned, which traversed nearly the whole of his property; and the Committee had decided that for the space of a single mile in the same field the London and York line should cross that railway, and had decided on a line which it was physically impossible to construct, unless another line, which had received the legislative sanction, was altogether abandoned. He thought that the Committee, by the first paragraph of their Report, showed a diffidence in the decision they had come to. They said they must come to a decision, as the Session was so nearly at an end. Not to come to a decision, might be, he admitted, a great evil, but it was a far greater evil that the facts were not fully and completely inquired into. He had a perfect right to ask the House to recommit the Bill and suspend proceedings in the case, if it were only from the fact that important competing companies had not been heard before that Committee. They would have furnished a body of evidence against the project which would be of the utmost importance, but they were precluded doiug so. When the London and York case had closed, an appeal was made to the Chairman that they should be heard by counsel, but the request was not acceded to; and he appealed to any hon. Gentleman present, who had been Chairman of a Committee of that House, if that refusal were not unfair, and contrary to precedent. Besides, the Committee had not been unanimous in their decision, and it was only by the casting vote of the Chairman that the preamble of the Bill was affirmed. Upon these grounds he asked the House to suspend further proceedings on this Bill.

Mr. Hutt seconded the Motion, and thought the House had good reason to be dissatisfied with the decision of the Committee. As to the proceedings of the Committee, he did not wonder that they felt their physical energies giving way under the overwhelming mass of business before them; it was scarcely to be expected that their strength should keep up against such accumulating matters, and to that circumstance might be, perhaps, attributed their unwillingness to adopt a course more consonant with the regulations of the House. But to whatever cause it was to be attributed, their proceedings were scarcely consistent with the rules of Parliament, or the justice of the case. It was very true that, as yet, they had not concluded their labours, but virtually and effectually they had with regard to the present Bill. The House, when it nominated certain Members to inquire into a case, necessarily required that some report should be presented on each particular Bill, but at the present moment several Bills had been disposed of without a hearing, or the slightest consideration, as much as if they had never appeared before the Committee at all. For these reasons, he considered it his duty to support the Motion of his hon. Friend for the recommittal of the Bill.

Lord Courtenay said, that as Chairman of the Committee to which those Bills had been entrusted, he might perhaps be excused if he stated to the House the course of proceeding, and as that, and not the peculiar merits of the projects, had been made the chief subject of comment by the hon. Member for Sheffield, he would confine himself as strictly as possible to meeting that particular question. The Report which had been that morning laid before the Members of the House, mentioned the number of Bills which had been referred to the consideration of the Committee. The hon. Member opposite complained of the apologetic tone in which the Report was introduced; if apology were discernible, he could assure the hon. Member that it was not from any misgiving of error or irregularity, but that, impressed with the stupendous charge with which they were entrusted, they wished to evince a sense of that importance, and also show their respect to the House. They, therefore, were not content with giving a mere dry and general detail, but explained the circumstances which led to their decision. He must be permitted now to say that, although upon the merits of the two Bills, the Committee were not unanimous, but divided, in their decision, as respected the course of proceeding throughout their sitting, they were invariably unanimous. Whether, therefore, right or wrong, regular or irregular, these proceedings were adopted in accordance with the decision of the Committee. The hon. Member for Sheffield had stated that an arrangement had been made, and a resolution adopted, wherein they stated their intention of including in one Bill the Sheffield and Lincoln and Tottenham and Farringdon-street Extension. That was perfectly true; and it was on this ground that the Bills thus included, were considered as more or less in competition with each other, either in a direct line north and south, or, laterally, east and west; and subsequent to this arrangement, on a special application, the Hertford and Biggleswade was added to the list by sub-grouping. That preliminary matter being settled, they proceeded to classify the schemes in the order in which they should be heard. The London and York was that taken first, because it was the first in point of fact. Throughout the entire case counsel were let in to cross-examine every witness; and it would be found, on reference to the Report, that one, two, three, four, and five Counsel exercised this right. If any Member had been present in the Committee-room during the seventy or eighty days that the Committee sat upon the line, he would have seen the course adopted, and been enabled to bear witness to the accuracy of his statements. The hon. Member had also referred to the Resolution adopted by the Committee on the Bill; several members of the Committee had expressed a desire of coming to a decision on such parts of the case, as would not inflict injury on other parties who had claims to be heard before the Committee; and, as far as the leading lines were concerned, it was considered necessary and desirable to come to some resolutions on such parts of the scheme as would involve this arrangement of the business. In pursuance with this, application was made before the case of the London and York was gone into, and when an objection was taken to it in respect to certain errors which were alleged to exist in the plans of that scheme, that the whole case between the two great lines should be taken, and that the counsel on behalf of the Direct Northern should state the places at which they proposed to prove the effect of the errors specified to be so great as to render the work impracticable. It was at the same time requested by counsel on the side of the London and York, that the Committee should come to a decision on the merits of that scheme after the termination of the Tottenham and Farringdon-street case. Himself and his hon. Colleagues on the Committee concurred in saying, in answer to the application, that on the Monday following they would give their decision separately on those applications. On the Monday they met, and came to the conclusion that when the cases of the Direct Northern and Farringdon-street Extension lines were closed, they would proceed to consider the merits of the two competing lines before them, for effecting a second trunk railway communication between London and York, viz. that of the London and York Company, and that which consisted of the Cambridge and Lincoln, the Direct Northern, and the Farringdon Extension lines, in conjunction with the Eastern Counties Railway, already executed as far as Cambridge. All were agreed on this Resolution. We were guided by the arguments of the Report of the Board of Trade in excluding that part of the Midland Counties Railway which was considered to be in competition with the London and York line. They considered that it would be exceedingly objectionable to extend further the Midland Counties scheme, considering the circumstances under which that Company had acted. They took that step with due deliberation, subject to the responsibility of that House. They felt justified that the course they took was in conformity with the interests of all parties concerned. An application was made to them on July 16, on behalf of the Eastern Counties and the York and North Midland Companies, to be allowed to present rebutting evidence against the London and York lines. The application was made by Mr. Talbot; and an answer was returned to the effect that the Committee, in the exercise of its discretion, considered the London and York, the Cambridge and Lincoln, the Direct Northern, and the Tottenham and Farringdon Extension, with the existing Cambridge Railway, were the only two schemes that competed inter se as it respected a direct trunk communication from London to York; and thus the Cambridge and Huntingdon line should be taken next in order. These Resolutions were come to, after a due examination of evidence, and a careful consideration of the question. The opposition of Lord Sidney had been referred to, and on that subject he would say a few words. Counsel on behalf of that noble Lord had been heard, witnesses called and subjected to examination and cross-examination; many questions were asked by the Members of the Committee, and a map of the place was used to guide them in their inquiry. In fact, it was not without much care and consideration that the Committee decided, and then not before the case on behalf of the noble Lord had been fully heard. The principle on which the Committee acted was, at every stage of their business, to select such Bills as might be considered competing schemes, and to view them in connexion with each other. The House had entrusted the Committee with a certain discretionary power, and it had been honestly and, he trusted, impartially exercised. That was the resolution they had acted upon. He was not conscious of having omitted any part of his duty as a Member of the Committee; but thought all of them had acted in accordance with precedent, and in conformity with the immense interest involved in the case. He would not say further, than that they had endeavoured to do the best they could, and hoped the House would consider that they had not acted in any way improperly.

Mr. B. Wall was understood to say, that the Committee would not have done their duty if they had acted upon a different system. He must be allowed to affirm, without the least disrespect to the individual who had complained of breathless haste, that the great railway power was not in existence at the time the Great Western or South Western was before Parliament. He was quite sure the Committee had done right in coming to the decision they had come to, and thought the House would exercise a sound judgment in not agreeing to the Motion.

Mr. Darby hoped the House would look at what the system of grouping was, before they came to a decision that the Committee had exercised an improper discretion. He believed that the system of grouping was the best that could have been adopted under the circumstances; but you must abandon that system altogether unless you allowed the Committee to deal with the groups. The hon. Member for Sheffield had totally mistaken the principle on which the groups were formed, and that mistake ran through the whole of his speech. A certain number of Bills were referred, and then it was decided which were competing inter se. He was prepared to maintain that the Committee had taken the only course they could take. As far as the Report went on the merits of the line, he held himself responsible for every word in it. He maintained that Lord Lindsay's wish was to be heard more than once on the same point. He believed that on every point the Committee had acted regularly; and if they had been misled, it was in coming to the House for the instructions on which they had acted. If the Committee were not to have the power of deciding which were competent lines, he trusted he might never be placed on a Committee where there were groups of railroads, because he felt that he should have undertaken to do that which was impossible. It would be a condemnation of the system of grouping.

Mr. P. M. Stewart had no doubt that the Committee on Group X believed they had discharged their duty according to the rules and practice of the House, and in justice to the parties; but the question was, whether the practice of this Committee was consistent with the practice of other Committees? If Group X had acted according to the principle which the House wished the Committee to adopt, then every other Committee had acted wrong. The Committee of which he was a Member did not regroup their Bills, but admitted them as competitors one with another. The competitors of the London and York were virtually put out of court by the Committee adopting the preamble of the Bill promoted by that Company; and he considered it was very hard upon the petitioners that only part of their case was heard when the Committee came to their decision. He gave every credit to the Committee for good intentions, but he certainly thought they had taken a wrong course. With all his predilections for sustaining the Reports of Committees of that House, he must say, that if the Report in question was adopted by the House, then nine-tenths of the Committees which had sat during the Session had been wrong.

Mr. P. Scrope said, as he had voted against the preamble of the Bill, it might be inferred that he was not violently opposed to the recommittal of the Bill. With regard to the course of proceeding, the Committees were involved in great difficulty. Eleven different and important railway schemes were committed to them: the map of the country, which was laid before them, looked more like a spider's web than anything else; and every one of the eleven were competing lines, in a greater or less degree, with the London and York line; so that the Committee would have had very great difficulty in grouping the lines. The only fault alleged against the Committee was, that they had not heard rebutting evidence against the London and York line. Now, they had occupied no less than ten days in hearing rebutting evidence against that line from the Cambridge and Lincoln line. The Committee thought enough of time had been devoted to that part of the case, and they were of opinion that the other parties were not likely to bring forward anything that was new. Although he had differed from his Colleagues upon the preamble, he was quite agreed with them in regard to the course of proceeding which was adopted; and he saw no ground for referring the Bill back to the Bill.

Mr. W. R. Collett had great confidence in the Committee; but he must protest against the decision they had arrived at, and would vote for the recommittal of the Bill.

The House divided on the original Question:—Ayes 78; Noes 19: Majority 59.

Report to be further considered.

Bill to be engrossed.

THE INCOME TAX—CASE OF MRS. KING.] Mr. C. Buller wished to put a question, and he owed an apology, perhaps, to the House for not having brought forward a Motion upon the subject, but he should be excused for having taken the simpler and the speedier mode of getting information upon it, by asking a question of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury. The question which he had to put related to a petition which he had some time since presented to the House, from a lady of the name of King, complaining that, although her income was under 150*l.* a year, and although she had repeatedly applied to have a return made to her of the amount collected from her tenants, her income being derived from houses, and notwithstanding a couple of years' continual remonstrance on the subject to the local Commissioners and to the Treasury, she had not been able to procure as yet any return of the money. The petition further stated that she had been subjected to a good deal of vexation, annoyance, and ill treatment from some of those with whom she had thus been brought in contact. He wished, therefore, to ask the hon. Gentleman if he had made any inquiry into the circumstances, and whether he could now give any information as to the case?

Mr. Cardwell said, that before the petition alluded to was presented by the hon. Gentleman, the case of Mrs. King had received the attention both of the Commissioners at Somerset House and of the Treasury. The case had been brought before the Commissioners, to whom, by law, cases of this kind were left; and they, after the fullest investigation, were perfectly satisfied that the claim of Mrs. King to a return of the duty had not been substantiated; and upon further inquiry made by himself into the case, he had every reason to believe that the decision come to by the Commissioners was supported by the strongest evidence. With regard to the complaint as to the vexation and annoyance which the petitioner alleged that she had sustained from the conduct of the officers, he had also investigated that charge, and believed that it was entirely without foundation.

EMPLOYMENT IN WORKHOUSES.] Mr. Duncombe said, that he had, a short time ago, presented a petition to the House, complaining of the practice which existed in the workhouse at Mansfield. By the New Poor Law any person seeking nightly shelter and food, could be sent to a task of work, with a view of repaying the parish with that task of work for the relief afforded. The practice which prevailed in cases of that sort in the workhouse referred to was this. There was a wheel at which persons seeking nightly shelter or food were placed at work from one hour to four hours in the morning. This was not a wheel that produced anything. It neither drew water nor ground corn; but was established solely for the purpose of hard labour. From one to eight persons could work at the wheel, and if there were more than one, the master of the workhouse put on additional weight, so as to make the task more difficult. The circumstance was regarded in the neighbourhood with great dissatisfaction, and was thought to be contrary to the spirit and the letter of the New Poor Law Act. He had taken the liberty, at the time when he presented the petition, of drawing the right hon. Baronet's attention to the allegations contained in it, and he now wished to ask the right hon. Baronet if he had made inquiry into the subject, and if so, what steps he had taken in regard to it, if he considered the practice illegal?

Sir James Graham said, that in consequence of what had fallen in March last from the hon. Gentleman, in reference to this subject, the Poor Law Commissioners had communicated with the Poor Law Guardians of the Union in question, about the illegality of the application of labour to machinery, the working of which yielded nothing. He thought, with them, that such employment of labour was of a penal character, and that it was neither within the spirit nor the letter of the New Poor Law Amendment Act. The first communication had not, it appeared, led to the discontinuance of this mode of employing labour, which led to a peremptory order being subsequently sent by the Poor Law Commissioners for its immediate discontinuance.

CRUSHING BONES IN WORKHOUSES.] Mr. Wakley wished to ask the right hon. Baronet if he had received any information from the Poor Law Commissioners relative to a practice which he understood to prevail in the Union of Andover in Hampshire. He understood that one of the guardians of the Union had complained to the Poor Law Commissioners that the paupers of the Union were employed in crushing bones, and that, while so employed, they were in the habit of quarrelling with each other about the bones, of extracting the marrow from them, and of gnawing the meat which they sometimes found at their extremities; this was certainly a most serious, as well as a most shocking affair. He could state potitively that one of the guardians had complained of this, and he begged to ask the right hon. Baronet if he had heard anything relative to it from the Poor Law Commissioners, or from any other quarter; and whether he had inquired into the subject?

Sir James Graham could not believe in the existence of such an abuse as was embodied in the statement just made. The House must have heard that statement with horror. He himself had never heard any statement similar to that which the hon. Gentleman had made. Had the facts alleged been true he was quite satisfied that they would have been represented to him, and had they been so represented, he would have insisted on the fullest investigation of them. He would again repeat, that he could not believe that such an abuse existed, otherwise he should have heard of it.

Mr. Wakley: Will the right hon. Baronet deem it his duty, after the statement which he had now made, to inquire into the subject?

Sir James Graham: Most certainly; I shall institute an inquiry this very night.

Affairs of Greece.] On the Motion that the Order of the Day for the Second Reading of the Exchequer Bills Bill be now read,

Viscount Palmerston said: Sir, in making the observations which I am about to submit to the House relative to the kingdom of Greece, I feel that I cannot claim the attention of the House on the ground that the subject which I am going to bring under its consideration concerns either the military or the political interests of the country, or its commercial or even its pecuniary interests, to any very considerable extent. Politically, we have no interests worth mentioning with regard to the kingdom of Greece. That State is not sufficiently important to form an essential element in the general balance of European power; we have, therefore, no peculiar political interest with respect to the kingdom of Greece. The commerce of Greece cannot by any possibility be very extensive, and, therefore, we can have no commercial or selfish interests there to maintain. In a pecuniary point of view, indeed, we are, to a certain degree, concerned, because we are now paying for Greece a portion of the interest upon the Greek loan which was guaranteed by the three protecting Powers; and anything which tends to retain Greece in a state of disorder, and to continue to prevent her from paying the interest upon her own debt, must, to a certain extent, affect this country in a pecuniary point of view. But the subject has higher claims upon the attention of the House and the country, because it concerns the honour and good faith of Great Britain. The circumstances which led to the establishment of the kingdom of Greece are well known. Every one must remember that there broke out in Greece in 1820 a general resistance to the Turkish authority. That resistance continued from 1820 till 1827, during which time a sanguinary and exterminating war was carried on between the Turkish troops and the Greek nation. In 1827, England, Russia, and France, concurred in the determination to put a stop to those hostilities, and to erect Greece into a separate and independent State; and the result was, that the kingdom of Greece was so constituted, and England and the other two Powers guaranteed by Treaty the independence and integrity of that kingdom. I say, therefore, that anything which threatens the independence which we have guaranteed—anything which threatens the prosperity of that kingdom which we were parties to create, affects directly, and in a material respect, the honour of the British Crown. After those transactions which created the kingdom of Greece, and defined its frontier, a King was appointed, and that King being of tender age, a Council of Regency was sent from Bavaria to administer the affairs of the country. That regency has been much abused. No doubt faults were committed by members of the regency. Theirs was the great fault of quarrelling among themselves. There were intrigues and cabalting amongst them, one against the other; but be their faults what they may, they conferred upon Greece great and substantial benefits. They established in Greece what may be called popular assemblies. They gave it municipal corporations—they established freedom of the press, trial by jury, a national Church, provincial assemblies, and they laid the foundation for that general representative constitution which the three allied Powers had promised to the Greeks, and which the King of Bavaria, the father of the Sovereign, and acting as his tutor during his minority, had promised them, and which the son himself, on coming of age, had also promised. That constitution, so long promised, was long delayed; and during the early years of the King's reign—after the regency had ceased, and the King had assumed the functions of Government—through the agency of those who had been successively engaged as Ministers, great abuses prevailed—great and terrible oppressions were practised on the Greeks; there was a lavish expenditure and squandering of the public funds in the maintenance of a bad system; and the result was that the finances of the Government were unable to meet the current expenditure—the interest of the loan was unpaid, and the payment of that interest was thus thrown upon the guaranteeing Powers. At last the discontent of the Greek nation at the misgovernment under which they suffered got to such a pitch, and was so universal, that in the month of September, 1843, by the almost unanimous act of the Greek nation, a calm, a peaceful, and tranquil revolution was, in the course of a few hours, effected. What was required was, that Greece should receive from the Sovereign that representative constitution which had been already guaranteed to it. A general assembly was summoned. It sat for many months, and, in conjunction with the royal authority, completed a code for a representative government for Greece. Those who only looked to the surface of things, who did not keep a strict watch, or who were not acquainted with the secret springs of that system which was in operation in Greece, might have expected that, when a constitution was established, things would go on in a different way; that the Sovereign would be content to act within the limits of the constitution, and that the people would be allowed to enjoy those privileges and that security to which, by the constitution, they were entitled. I am sorry to say that this was not the case. The Minister who had been called to act, Mavrocordato, was an enlightened man and a good patriot, anxious to secure by constitutional means the happiness and welfare of his country. He was, however, on that very account, soon removed from office, and his place was taken by a man of a very different description. The present Minister of Greece, Coletti, was educated in the school of Ali Pacha of Jannina, where he had imbibed principles very different from those which would fit a man to administer a constitutional system. For a considerable time past Greece has, step by step, been falling into a state of the most dreadful anarchy. The constitution has been virtually set aside; arbitrary acts of power have been practised everywhere. Elections took place for a representative assembly; but in many places these elections were controlled by an armed force employed for that purpose by the Government; and where the Government was not able to control the elections at the hustings, the members who had been duly elected were set aside by the arbitrary decision of a Committee of the Chamber, appointed unconstitutionally by the Government, expressly for the purpose of expelling every man who was hostile to the Government. Judges have been dismissed because it was thought they would administer the law with justice; others have been transferred from place to place, as best suited the interests and views of the Government. The liberty of the press has been shackled. Tyranny of the most grievous kind has been exercised on the people. The regular army has been disbanded, and in its place bands of palikars—robbers and plunderers, have been employed under the orders of the Government. The most dreadful excesses have been practised upon the unfortunate people. Torture has again been used—a practice that existed before the constitution was formed; and Gentlemen in this House will hardly believe that in a Christian country, and amongst a people that profess to be a civilized nation, such abominations could take place as those that have been practised in Greece. This was the mode of proceeding used before the constitution, and I believe it is now repeated for the same purposes. When vengeance is intended to be taken on a village, either on account of the absconding of conscripts, or for supposed excesses committed by an individual, a number of the inhabitants are seized; some are suspended by the feet, swung like a pendulum, and beaten as they are swung; some are tied by the hands and feet, and a ramrod run through the calves of their legs: some are laid on their backs, and a great heavy stone placed on their chests, and there they are left to struggle till they are nearly suffocated, and until life is almost extinct. These facts cannot be denied; and to such a pitch have these barbarous proceedings been carried, that wild cats have been tied up in the loose dresses of the peasant women! The man Tyinos, who has been the great actor in these cruelties, is now under the protection of the Greek Government. These things are still going on. I hold in my hand a petition from a certain number of persons in Mycarne, who state that they themselves were the victims of proceedings of this kind; that fifty members of their village were carried off by a band of Palikari, and subjected to this torture, and to these atrocious proceedings. Of course the revenue of the country is squandered upon these armed banditti, and the regular service of the State is left in arrear; the interest of the debt is thrown on the three allied guaranteeing Powers, and no effort whatever has been made towards payment by the Government of Greece. Now, I should like to ask Her Majesty's Government why they have not at length insisted on the execution of that Treaty stipulation by which the Government of Greece were bound to apply to the payment of the interest of their debt the first produce of the public revenue? That was the condition of the Treaty of 1832. I am not certain whether, by some subsequent arrangement, specified branches of revenue were to be appropriated to the purpose. But whichever of the two arrangements is now in force, we are entitled to exact compliance with it. The Government of Greece should be compelled to have recourse to every method of economy; and no method of economy is so certain in its effects, as to put in offices of trust honest men who will not abuse the power that is given to them. I say, therefore, that we are entitled, both in our capacity of creditors of Greece, and in our capacity of guaranteers of the independence and integrity of Greece, to give strong advice, and to make urgent representations to its Government on these matters. I have stated the nature of the disorders that prevail in Greece; there is no security for life and property in any part of the kingdom; and assassinations occur even in the very capital of the country. But these depredations are not confined to Greece and Greek subjects. There is an organized system of rapine established on the Greek frontier, to be exercised on the neighbouring districts of Turkey; and thereby the most serious differences are liable at any time to arise between the Turkish Government and the Government of Greece. Therefore, we who are the parties that guaranteed the independence of Greece, and who may be called on to defend Greece, if she be attacked by the Turks, have a right to require that the Greek Government shall abstain from proceedings which are so calculated to bring them into collision and hostility with the neighbouring country. Now, perhaps, I shall be told that all this has arisen from the struggle which is constantly going on in Greece between the various parties who range themselves under the standard of different Foreign Powers. I shall be told that it is owing to the disputes between the "English party," and the "Russian party," and the "French party." What Russian party or French party there may be, it is not for me to say; but I do take upon myself to assert that an English party there is not, never has been, never will be, and never can be in Greece, any more than in any other independent country in the world. Sir, we want no party in any country. The English party in Greece—that which is called the English party in Greece—is that which was the English party in Spain, and which is the English party in every country in the world with which we have any relations, or in which we can exert any influence; it is the national party; it is the party who look only to the interests of their own country; and it is only according as any party in a foreign country are animated by such feelings, that we can have any motive for supporting or assisting them in our relations with them. Why what earthly advantage — English advantage—can we expect or wish to obtain from Greece? I am sure I speak not only for the late Government, but also for the Government that now exists, when I say, that the only interest which England can have to consult in its relations with Greece, is to give such support and countenance as we can properly give to parties in a foreign country — to those men who are best calculated and most disposed to promote the welfare and prosperity and political independence of their own country. But then it is said that there is a struggle between these parties; that Mavrocordato was considered as the representative of the English party, and that his dismissal was wholly and solely upon that account. Now I am quite sure that Mavrocordato would repel with disdain the imputation of having exercised any influence, or of having entertained a wish, to serve the views or objects of any foreign country, if those views did not promote the interest and independence of Greece. Colletti, to be sure. may also suppose that he is promoting the interest and independence of Greece. He may imagine that constitutional governments are very bad things, and that by driving the Greeks to despair, and creating discontent and dissatisfaction throughout every part of the country, he may produce outbreaks which will tend to make men believe that the Greeks are unfit for constitutional government; and that he and that party who wish to establish arbitrary power will then be able to appeal to experience for the purpose of showing that their system of government is the only one suited to the present condition of the people of Greece. But such an opinion would be utterly unfounded, because any man who has attended to the course pursued by the Greek Assembly in establishing their constitution, will admit that it was impossible for any men of any nation to show themselves more deserving of the liberties and privileges they thereby acquired. I cannot believe that the Government of France can really partake in the views which alone appear to to me as offering an explanation of the conduct of Coletti. What possible interest can France have in crushing the rising liberties of Greece? What possible interest can France have in preventing Greece from gaining that degree of prosperity and happiness which its limited extent permits it to acquire? Greece never can become formidable among the Powers of Europe. Her small size prevents it—her limited population and her geographical position prevent it. Greece never can be anything but a prosperous, commercial, and intellectual community. That she will be; and I think that the French nation, who attach such value to the constitutional liberties which they have acquired, ought to sympathize with the people of Greece, and, instead of desiring to support any faction which endeavours to overthrow the constitution and to tyrannize over the people, ought, on the contrary, to wish for the maintenance of Grecian independence, and desire to see the Greeks enjoy those constitutional blessings which the French pride themselves upon. I would urge Her Majesty's Government to appeal to the French Government on this matter, to press upon their attention the horrible cruelties and abominable abuses which are now going on in Greece, and to remind them of the obligations which France, as well as England, has contracted by the Treaty to which France, as well as England, is a party; and I cannot but believe that if England and France were cordially to unite, not caring about the name of the individual who may act as Minister, and casting aside all those little jealousies and petty vanities which sometimes are permitted to influence the conduct of the agents of Governments, and were to express a firm determination that order should be re-established in Greece, and that the constitution which has been granted, according to the promise of the Three Powers, should not be set aside by the unjustifiable exercise of arbitrary power (and I cannot persuade myself that Russia would not also concur in such a course)—I sincerely believe that such joint efforts would be successful. But even if we are left to act alone, we are entitled to demand the execution of the Treaty—we are entitled to demand that the first produce of the revenue shall be set aside for the payment of the interest of that portion of the debt which we ourselves have guaranteed; and I think that a display of energy and firmness on the part of Great Britain in that matter, would not fail to have the best, the most desirable effects on the course of events in Greece. It may suit the views of those who labour to produce disorganization in foreign countries, to represent England as anxious everywhere to establish political ascendancy; but, Heaven knows, the alarm of these people, if there be any who entertain such alarm in sincerity, must by this time have pretty well abated; for, as to "political ascendancy," or influence in any part of the world, of that charge the present Government of England may be most entirely acquitted. But the people who make that charge, make it with an utter ignorance of everything belonging to the political condition and possible views of England. We cannot be like the old Romans, whose motto was, Regere imperio populos. England never can look—the feelings of the country never can permit that we should look—to foreign conquest, or endeavour to obtain political influence, other than that which is for the good of the country in which such influence may be exercised. I can quite understand that when we may have the misfortune to be at war with a great Foreign Power, we might then endeavour to establish an English party in the Cabinet of a third Power, whose aid we might look for in the course of hostilities; but in time of peace, we can look for no political influence except that which is beneficial to those over whom it is exerted. I consider the love of conquest by war as one of the distinguishing marks of a barbarous age: in proportion as nations advance in civilization, in that same proportion they cease to think it a glory to inflict upon their neighbours that greatest of all wrongs which consists in conquest by violence; they cease to seek glory by conquest. They aspire to those greater glories which consist in the cultivation of the arts of peace. It is in the spirit of the people of this country, and it ought always to be in the spirit of the Government of this country, to endeavour, as far as the political influence of England may extend, to take care that such influence shall be exerted to protect the weak, to rescue the oppressed, to extend civilization, and to confer, as far as we are able to do so, the blessings of peace, independence, and happiness upon all nations with which we have any relations whatever. I say, then, that there ought to be no jealousy with regard to England in the minds either of the French or of the Russian Government; that in Greece there is no conflict of foreign interests; that we have no selfish objects to pursue; but that we are bound, in the performance of a duty, to exert all the influence which either Treaties or our political position may give us, to secure happiness to the Greeks under an independent and constitutional Government—to confer which upon the Greek nation was the object, as it ought to be the result, of the Treaties of 1827 and 1832. Sir, I have no Motion to submit to the House upon this subject. I could not see that which I have read in the newspapers of the atrocities now going on in Greece, and permit the Session to pass over without offering some observations thereupon to the House. I have no doubt that the Government shares in the anxiety which I myself feel; but I have a doubt as to the energy with which they will give effect to their feelings. I trust, however, that I may be mistaken; that they will do that which I think they may do successfully; and that the Greek nation having, in the first place, owed greatly to this country the establishment of their independence as a free and separate nation, may also owe to us the further obligation of being secured in the enjoyment of those constitutional privileges which have been conferred upon them with the sanction and concurrence of their Sovereign.

Mr. Baillie Cochrane said, it was now only two years since a change took place in Greece which astonished the whole of Europe. He did not use the term "revolution," because the people themselves disclaimed it, declaring that they had only asserted their just and unalterable rights. He was no advocate for appeals to the people, or declarations of right; but he conceived that to Greece must be applied very different principles to those which should regulate other European organizations. She had shaken off the yoke of Turkey, and whatever might be our opinion of the advantage of preserving the integrity of the Ottoman empire, she had exercised her sovereignty of Greece with as much violence as she had used in its attainment. The independence of Greece was acknowledged in most flattering terms by the great Powers. They were supposed to be consulted in the selection of a Sovereign. Every proclamation exhorted the Greeks to rally round their glorious constitution, to cherish their liberties. King Otho was received with all the enthusiastic confidence of a people who, when they lost their original power, still retained their original greatness of mind. It was a glorious dawn for a young nation. Every heart warmed at the idea of giving back happiness to that country to which we were indebted for the first rudiments of art and civilization. But the feeling was very general, that no man ever ascended the throne under happier auspices. His own language on assuming the Government was, "Place your trust in me, O Greeks, as I place mine in you; then will your happiness and intelligence be augmented." He would in courtesy extend to the King of Greece the same great elemental principle, that "the King can do no wrong," which was the basis of constitutional monarchy; nor would he be wanting in that respectful language which should always be heard at the footstool of the throne in the few remarks with which he should trouble the House. He should assume that the King, equally with the people, was the victim of a low intriguer—the victim of M. Coletti. That was not an exaggerated term. He would appeal to any hon. Member who was in communication with Greece, whether the accounts from that country of M. Coletti's conduct did not fully bear out his assertions? In this country of well-regulated and established institutions, it was impossible to conceive the excesses which had been practised upon the people under the authority of the Government. The barbarities exercised under orders were so atrocious, that the officers in command declined to enter into particulars. In one of the recent papers he read a letter from M. Crieyis, Governor of Etolia, a man not too well disposed towards the moderate party; from that letter this was an extract:—

"After having presented this statement to the Minister, it is now my duty to observe to him, that it is absolutely essential the Government should take prompt and efficacious means to remedy this state of things, or otherwise I request the Government to accept my resignation; because it is repugnant to me to remain in the government of a province where the other officers in command, whether designedly or unintentionally, exercise such gross violence, that they excite the population to acts of rebellion, compel them to take up arms against the Government—anything to relieve themselves from that oppression, personal, material, and moral, with which these officers endeavour to crush them."

That extract gave them great insight into the case. The people were driven to violence, so that their conduct might convey an impression to Europe that their nation was not fit for constitutional government. From all accounts, that appeared to be the real sense of M. Coletti's policy. And now, who was the fountain-head of all this mischief? He was well known to all Greece as M. Piscatory. M. Coletti was the mere tool in the hands of the French Minister. Even so far back as 1841, M. Piscatory boasted, "He had overthrown the English party of Mavrocordato, and established the French Government of M. Christides." Now, he must humbly suggest, that it was most pernicious policy for any foreign Minister to embark in intrigues in the view of overturning any particular Government. To speak of French influence, English and Russian influence, was insulting to the country. He appealed against M. Coletti's Government, because it was absolutely noxious to the country; because it heaped insults on the heads of those among our countrymen who sacrificed themselves in the war of independence; because it set aside all British interests—the interests of those who were, after all, the chief supporters of the Greek cause. He looked to M. Mavrocordato, because he was universally acknowledged to be the ablest statesman in that country, and far superior to all those petty party distinctions which were so paramount in the consideration of inferior men. At the period when the negotiations were carrying on between MM. Coletti and Mavrocordato, the latter insisted on the necessity of forming a coalition of all parties, as the only method which could give stability to the Government. Now, let them fairly consider M. Piscatory's conduct in April, 1844. He was of Sir E. Lyons' opinion, that any Ministry which did not comprehend MM. Mavrocordato and Coletti, would be imperfect. He said of M. Coletti, "It is evident that M. Coletti is not fit for a regular Government." What, then, was the cause of the sudden change in M. Piscatory's policy? Why, the attacks of the French press, which, with that jealous vanity which was the great instinct of the nation, charged him with weakness for allowing M. Mavrocordato to remain in office; moreover, at that time some little misunderstanding between the two Governments arose. M. Piscatory thought he would anticipate events, and become one of the great leaders of the war party; and, therefore, that he could never sufficiently entangle the affairs of Greece. Those were considerations which made him take so active a part with M. Coletti—driving him in his own carriage to the council chamber, and showing his interference in the most public and officious manner. And how had this Government, supported by French influence, the offspring of French intrigue, conducted themselves? He had mentioned the atrocious conduct of some of the subordinates of the Government; one-third had been expelled at the will of the Minister, and it was now proposed to create twelve new members of the Senate. General Grivas, a notorious rebel, who commanded a troop of brigands, and had been exiled to Constantinople by Mavrocordato, was released by M. Coletti, and made commander of the forces. The town of Athens was full of irregular troops, who lived by the wildest excesses. There was a perfect stagnation to commerce. The provinces were in revolt, the Chambers controlled by illegal means, the national lands were seized and distributed to all the most worthless; and if the statue of Law was not wholly overthrown, it at least tottered to its base. Promotion through every grade was lavished without measure or selection, save that of the most licentious; for it was the reign of license. Such was the condition of a country which we fostered, over whose growth and education we pledged ourselves to watch; and yet the blame was not to us; all had been done by Sir E. Lyons that could by any possibility avert these calamities. In the pages of the history of modern Greece, some gallant British names were chronicled; and what had been the fate of those who made every sacrifice for the land of their adoption? Take the case of General Sir Richard Church, a name which would remain in Greece when his persecutors would be forgotten, or only remembered with scorn. General Church was a distinguished officer in the English service, and sold his commission in order to enable him to devote his money to the Greek cause. Had General Church not convoked the Council of State after the 3rd of September, the King was lost; and the Council, had it not been for the influence of Sir Richard Church and Sir Edmund Lyons, were prepared to propose such terms as would have compelled his abdication. And now, after all that, the conduct of the Government was so insulting, that Sir Richard was compelled to resign all his offices. Sir Edmund Lyons, whose exertions for ten long years had been devoted to the real interest of Greece and its Sovereign—who during that period had never once returned to England—after ten years of absence, and ten years of unremitting toil, found all his efforts were fruitless. But Sir E. Lyons and Sir R. Church had gained that saddest of all rewards—the affection of the natives among whom they resided—the approbation of their Sovereign. That approbation, so strongly expressed by the right hon. Baronet at the head of Her Majesty's Government, had filled them with gratitude. Sir R. Church but a few days since wrote to him (Mr. Cochrane) thus:—

"You placed me in the most enviable position in the world—that of receiving the approbation of my conduct by the Prime Minister and my countrymen. It was, indeed, the proudest moment of my life when I read that the mention of my name was received with approbation there, and which so amply repaid my wounded feelings. I wish I could convey my feelings in a suitable manner to Sir R. Peel and the Members of the House."

Such a man might be deprived of his honours, but never lose his honour. It might be asked, where was the utility of commenting so earnestly on the conduct of M. Coletti and his hirelings? Could the Government interfere? Were they justified in requiring that a Minister should be appointed worthy of the nation and possessing its confidence? Would such interference be regarded with jealousy by the people themselves? These were vast considerations, on which it would ill become him to venture an opinion. The influence of M. Piscatory was secretly exercised. Like the mole he worked in the dark, and in the dirt. What representations, then, could be made, what rules enforced, which might not be evaded? Under no circumstances could it be viewed as a casus belli, for it could not be doubted that the Government of this country were considered in Greece their best friends, and whose kindness had been proved on many occasions; but there was not a reasoning man who did not see the difficult position in which they were placed. The very name of English, French, and Russian influences was odious to the pride of the Greek nation. But, even though the Government must remain silent, he still was rejoiced that the noble Viscount had directed the attention of the House to the present condition of that country; people who perhaps were wont to take but little interest in foreign affairs could at least know the poor result of all our exertions; and it might shame the French Government into a course of conduct more worthy of themselves. He had visited the country on different occasions, and had always left it with regret; and if ever he should again visit it, he should hope to find still undiminished the confidence which the nation placed in the good faith, the generosity, and the sympathy of Her Majesty's Government.

Sir R. Peel: Sir, I quite admit to the noble Lord that this country does stand in special and peculiar relations towards Greece. We are responsible for the foundation of that kingdom, which was established on the separation of Greece from Turkey, and upon that account this country must always feel a special interest in the prosperity and good government of Greece. We are also guarantees of the integrity of that kingdom, and we are, therefore, specially answerable that the course of Government in that country shall be such as not to provoke just reclamations from other Powers, and submit us to the obligation of defending Greece from the attacks of foreign countries. We stand also in another relation to Greece—the relation of a public creditor. We have advanced the money of this country towards the establishment of an independent Government in Greece, and the debt contracted by Greece has not been repaid. As, therefore, guarantees of the integrity of Greece, as having acted liberally towards her with respect to pecuniary matters, and Greece having contracted obligations towards this country which she has not been able and willing to discharge—on all these accounts it is impossible to deny that this country is peculiarly interested in and has a special right to interfere in the affairs of Greece. At the same time it is most desirable that we should reconcile the fulfilment of the obligations which Greece owes to us, with that which was our paramount object in interfering at all—namely, the maintenance of self-government, and of the integrity and independence of that country; and we ought, therefore, to be very careful that, in enforcing the engagements upon Greece which we certainly have a right to enforce, we do not destroy that which was our paramount object in interfering at all, namely, the power of Greece, by the administration of its own affairs, ultimately to acquire the position of an independent State. No one could have witnessed with more satisfaction than I did—and I am sure in this I speak the feeling of the whole Government — the prospects that opened in Greece when despotic rule terminated in that country, and, through the exertions of its own inhabitants a popular and constitutional form of Government was established; and though we felt it incumbent upon us to institute proceedings to insist upon the satisfaction of those engagements into which Greece had entered to us, though we had long complained of the non-fulfilment of those engagements, and had declared to Greece that the period had arrived when we could remain indifferent and passive no longer, still as we were interested in the establishment and maintenance of a popular and constitutional Government in Greece, a Government founded permanently on sound principles, on principles likely to insure the permanent prosperity of Greece, we were unwilling to press hardly upon her, and were most unwilling also to interfere with the acts of that Government in its course of reform, by pressing too eagerly for the fulfilment of those engagements by which she is bound to us. Therefore we have unwillingly consented to the postponement of those engagements into which Greece has entered for the payment of the debt due to this country. I admit that we have the right, under our Treaties with Greece, to enforce the payment of this money, and I am aware of the strong power the Government of this country have in their hands, in case of non-payment, to enforce it. I know we have the power, and the Government of Greece ought to bear it in mind. We have the power by our own separate and independent act, without reference to what may be the intentions of the other Powers who are parties to the same engagements. We have the right to call for the immediate payment of the debt due to us, and of enforcing it by taking possession for ourselves of portions of the revenues of Greece. At the same time the House will see that we could not resort to that extreme power which we possess under the Treaty, without bringing on a crisis, fatal, perhaps. to the existence of that popular form of Government in Greece, which we have been instrumental in creating, and which we are anxious should continue. I will not go into any discussion of the conditions under which we are entititled to exercise that power; there can be no doubt, however, that the power exists; and it is wholly from the influence of the motive I have referred to, by which we have been guided from the first—the desire to see Greece possessed of a Government that should command the confidence of its subjects, and which should be enabled to lay a foundation for the permanent prosperity of that kingdom, that we have refrained from exercising that power. The House will readily understand that I have not the same desire which is felt by the noble Lord and the hon. Gentleman who last spoke, of discussing the merits of particular individuals. I may as well as others have strong feelings on the subject. I may have my own particular sentiments as to the conduct of this or that public man; but, as the Minister of England, I feel that the proper duty of the Executive is to make such representations to the Government of Greece, as we believe the duty imposed on us require; but, acting with a desire to respect the integrity of Greece and the independence of its Government, I feel that it is not my duty to pronounce any opinion in this House of the conduct of M. Coletti, or the acts of his Government. If I was to discuss here the conduct of Mr. Coletti, or of M. Mavrocordato, or the policy of this or that Foreign Minister, or if I were here to go into the consideration of the question of why this or that man was turned out of office, or why this or that man was appointed, there is no limit to the extent of the discussion which might, and doubtless would, be provoked as to the conduct of Foreign Governments, and which would extend not merely to Greece, but to every other country with which we have diplomatic relations. And, upon the whole, nothing could be more unsatisfactory than such discussions, and nothing would less conduce to the maintenance of amicable relations between great countries than that their respective Ministers should be liable to be called upon in great representative assemblies like the House of Commons to enter into reciprocal discussions—for that they would be reciprocal there can be no doubt, as to the conduct of particular Ministers, and the acts of particular Governments. I abstain altogether, therefore, from commenting on the conduct of individuals who have been, or who are now, connected with the Greek Government, or of the acts of that Government. Those matters have formed the subject of representations from Her Majesty's Government to the Government of Greece, and that is the proper mode of proceeding. I may, however, be permitted so far to transgress the rule my duty compels me to observe, as again to repeat, that the conduct of the Government of Greece, and the conduct of Greece towards the distinguished man who has been alluded to already to-night — I mean General Church—does involve, on the part of the Government of Greece, and on the part of that country, if it approve of the act, a liability to the charge of having been guilty of as base an act of ingratitude as I ever heard of being perpetrated. I believe General Church is too proud to make any complaint, and he may rest satisfied that no dismissal by the Government of Greece can affect his high and unblemished character, or lessen the importance of his services in the eyes of Europe. It is some consolation also to know, that the real sufferers from such acts as those of which General Church has been made the victim, are not the objects of them but their authors. The noble Lord must, for the reasons I have stated, excuse me if I decline following him into the details into which he has entered. As I said before, these are subjects which are fit matters for representation and remonstrance between the Executive Government of one country and another, but they are not fit matters for discussion on my part in this assembly. The noble Lord has laid down a rule as to what should be the character of our interference with Foreign Governments; but he must excuse me for saying that his rule is not very distinct or definite. The true way for England to obtain influence with foreign countries, and to retain that influence, is to do justice to all countries, and to show itself superior to all views of mere self-interest, and to disclaim the ever-meddling and mischievous policy of dictating to any other country who shall be its Minister, and of requiring the dismissal of those who are supposed to be opposed to our interests, and the appointment of those who we may imagine are friendly to us. Let us exact from foreign countries only what we have a right to exact; and let us render strict justice to all, and I, for one, shall never despair of England obtaining by those fair and legitimate means every influence over foreign countries that it is becoming the character of a great country, or worthy of this country, to possess. It is true we may occasionally hear of the influence of some other country being predominant to-day; but, with respect to Greece, all I can say is, that if any Foreign Government has brought about the present internal condition of Greece, I wish that Government joy of its influence. I hold that our position, in the confidence of having attempted no such interference, is a proud one, and a position which will ultimately most conduce to the permanent influence of this country and the prosperity of Greece. But the noble Lord says that no country ought to be jealous of the interference of England, as we never interfere but to promote the accession to power of those who are known to be most deeply interested in the prosperity of their own country, and our only object being to promote the welfare of the country which is the object of our interference. Why, that is the excuse which every country would make. No country would be so unwise as to say we interfere to promote our own interests. The most meddling countries profess in their interference to have no object in view but that the best and most patriotic man should be the Minister, and that he should pursue the well-defined and well-understood interests, not of the particular country that interferes to appoint him, but of the country of which he is the Minister. There is no end of the declarations on the part of such countries that any interference of theirs with the government of other countries is most unwarrantable and unselfish, and that the Government with which they interfere ought to be most grateful on account of the interest which has dictated the interference. Therefore, I say, the rule laid down by the noble Lord is not sufficiently defined to justify its adoption. In the general principle for which he contends, I fully concur, namely, that it is our true policy to seek for the establishment of no English party in foreign countries, but to establish English influence by the manifestation of a desire to promote commercial prosperity, and to promote the real welfare of the people. That, I believe, is the foundation of true influence, and that is the influence which England seeks to obtain, and which England, by pursuing that course which she has hitherto adopted, will obtain. The noble Lord says there never was a period when England possessed less influence abroad. If he mean that influence which arises from a mischievous, active, and constant intermeddling with Foreign Governments—the directing who shall be Minister, the continually watching and spying into every act of Foreign Governments — if he meant that, we have not influence founded upon such a basis. I admit it. But if he mean there never was a time in the history of this country and of the world, when the influence of England, founded upon a confidence in justice, and a respect for our power, was less, I offer to the noble Lord a denial as distinct as his asseveration. And on account of the period of the Session, and the state of the House, I will follow his example, and allege no proof of what I assert; but I trust the House, in its desire to be relieved from further attendance, will place my asseveration against that of the noble Lord, and rejoice that neither I nor the noble Lord could have adduced any of the facts upon which our respective assertions are founded.

JOINT STOCK BANKS (SCOTLAND AND IRELAND).] The Chancellor of the Exchequer, on withdrawing the Joint Stock Banks (Scotland and Ireland) Bill, stated that he should bring forward a general measure on the subject next Session, for the purpose of rendering joint-stock banks in Scotland and Ireland subject to the regulations of similar banks in this country under the provisions of the Bill of last year, and wished, at the same time, to give notice to those joint-stock banks which might be established between the end of the present Session and the beginning of the next, that they would be included in the operation of that measure. He gave this notice in order that parties might not be taken by surprise

South Eastern (Deal Extension) Railway.] Bill reported specially from the Select Committee, without amendment.

The Marquess of Clanricarde moved that the Bill be recommitted, for the purpose of having duly investigated before it the objections to the Bill, which a Mr. Mourilyan, by his petition, prayed to be heard in substantiation of, but which the Select Committee had, according to his statement, refused to attend to. Those objections, the petition set forth, were to the contract deed, to the traffic tables, and to the direction of the line itself, the peritioner being prepared to suggest a much better one in all respects.

Lord Redesdale said, that the Committee had taken into its consideration the objections started by the petitioner, and found them altogether frivolous and vexatious.

The Earl of Shaftesbury, on the part of the Standing Orders' Committee, fully corroborated the noble Lord's statement as to the frivolous nature of the objections made by the petitioner.

The Marquess of Clanricarde withdrew his original Amendment, but moved that the evidence taken before the Select Committee on the Bill be printed.

Taxing Masters, Court of Chancery (Ireland) Bill.] Order of the Day for the Third Reading read. Bill read 3ª.

The Earl of Wicklow rose to move an Amendment. The Bill professed to assimilate the law in England and Ireland; and yet, though according to the English Bill, the Office of Taxing Master in the Court of Chancery was confined exclusively to solicitors of twelve years' standing, in the Irish Bill no qualification was specified for the same office. He therefore proposed, with the view of assimilating the law in both countries, that the persons to be appointed to the office of Taxing Master under this Bill should be solicitors having practised in the Court of Chancery for twelve years.

The Lord Chancellor said, that the Bill had been approved of by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and he would be responsible for the appointments. He did not think that solicitors ought to have the exclusive right to appointment to this office. Nineteen-twentieths of the business of the Taxing Master was mere matter of routine, and could be performed by any man of common sense and education; if a question of principle arose, a barrister was even a more competent person to decide on it than a solicitor. In the Common Law Courts in England the majority of persons filling the office of Taxing Master were barristers, and this was also in a great measure the case in the Courts of Equity; and, taking all the Courts together, the majority was composed of men who had practised as barristers. In the Court of Bankruptcy, it was left to the option of the Lord Chancellor to appoint either a solicitor or a barrister. The solicitors wished to be appointed to certain offices, amongst which was that of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery. In England no person was appointed to such an office but a person of high legal learning and experience. Another office was that of Examiner in the Courts of Equity. Should solicitors be selected to that office to the exclusion of barristers? Why, how much better was a barrister qualified to examine a witness than a solicitor! Besides those two offices, and that of Taxing Master, there were some others. He must contend against the exclusive principle, and hoped the appointment of these officers would be left to the judgment of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

Lord Cottenham said, that his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, was quite right in saying that a barrister would be a better examiner of witnesses than an attorney, because that was a business to which he was accustomed. Now, an appointment such as that under this Bill should be conferred on a person whose past duties were as nearly as possible similar to those of the office of Taxing Master. Now, it was notorious that a barrister knew nothing of costs, as he had nothing to do with them; while an attorney lived throughout the whole of his career in costs. The objection of his noble and learned Friend to the Amendment was, that it would exclude barristers; but as the Bill now stood, not only barristers might be appointed, but a coachman or footman, or any other person the Lord Chancellor might choose to patronise. He, in the course of his professional career, had on a few occasions to argue cases of costs, and he confessed that nothing had given him more trouble; but on each occasion he had to learn his lesson, as matters of this kind seldom or never came under his attention. He was surprised at the course his noble and learned Friend now took, since by the Bill of 1842 he admitted that attorneys were the qualified persons for the office in question, and the only qualified persons, barristers not being mentioned at all. Were he to ask any barrister in Westminster Hall if he could sit down and tax a Bill, he should be answered in the negative. If their Lordships wished to have barristers appointed to perform a duty of which they knew nothing, they would oppose the Amendment; but if in this case they wished to do "justice to Ireland," they would agree to it.

The Lord Chancellor: The form of the Amendment will give these appointments to solicitors and attorneys exclusively.

Lord Campbell said, he strongly suspected that there was a job at the bottom of this Bill. His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack had made a most ingenious speech, which he was able to do on any occasion, and in support of any cause; but probably he had so acted at a suggestion from a highly respectable quarter. But his noble and learned Friend had not answered the question of the noble Earl (of Wicklow), why should there be a difference made between England and Ireland in this matter? By the Bill of 1842, of which his noble and learned Friend approved, the office was limited to attorneys or solicitors of ten years' standing. He thought his noble and learned Friend would find that he was as ill qualified for the office of Taxing Master as himself or any Member of the Bar. Could his noble and learned Friend tell him whether the charge for taking instructions should be 3*s.* 4*d.* or 6*s.* 8*d.*, or what the charge ought to be for this item —"To dining with you, and having much conversation respecting your cause?" Would his noble and learned Friend consider the dinner as a set-off for the conversation? He thought his noble and learned Friend might spend much more than the long vacation in vainly trying to learn this business. With respect to the observation that some baristers were now taxing masters in the courts in Westminster Hall, he would remind his noble and learned Friend that most of them had previously been solicitors and attorneys, and therefore were qualified. He trusted that the noble Earl would persist in his Amendment and divide the House.

Lord Stanley admitted that he was not competent to discuss the duties performed by the officers in question, and would not attempt to dispute the opinion of the noble and learned Lord opposite, founded, as it was, upon that long experience which he had had in the Court of Chancery, Ireland, respecting the qualifications of the solicitors of Dublin. No doubt there might be found among them persons competent to the office; but the question was, whether the selection of persons for the office should be left to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland?—not to this or that particular Lord Chancellor, for the purpose of patronage or jobbing, as the noble and learned Lord had gratuitously assumed. The question was, whether they would leave it to the Lord Chancellor to appoint these officers from barristers and solicitors, or that the selection should be made exclusively from solicitors? For himself, he should be satisfied to leave the selection to the responsibility of the Lord Chancellor, on whichever side of the House he might sit; and he should impute no motive to any individual who filled that high office, whether he selected the larger or the smaller number from one body or the other. The argument of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack was directed against confining the choice to solicitors. It appeared that high authorities differed as to whether barristers or solicitors were best qualified and most competent to fill this office. His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, considered barristers better qualified for the office; whereas the noble and learned Lord opposite thought that solicitors were better adapted for such an office. He hoped that he should be guilty of no offence if he placed his confidence in the opinion of his noble and learned Friend and the Chancellor of Ireland, rather than in that of the two noble and learned Lords opposite. He believed that his noble and learned Friend would not object to the Amendment, if it extended to barristers or solicitors of ten years' practice.

The Marquess of Clanricarde was not surprised at this measure, for it was in conformity with all their proceedings with regard to Ireland, and which had been productive of such excitement in that part of the kingdom. For his part, he believed that the Bill had been drawn with the view of some piece of patronage. He thought the insinuation thrown out against the attorneys and solicitors of Ireland would annoy and aggravate them. If there were the slightest ground for any such insinuation, it was still one which it would not be very prudent or very wise to make; but he begged utterly to deny that any such ground did exist. He would maintain that the solicitors of Ireland were as respectable and as intelligent a body as the solicitors of England. In fact, he knew them to be as respectable and intelligent as any class in any country in the world. He wished, therefore, to know why a distinction—always odious, but in this case particularly so—should be drawn between the solicitors of the two countries. Why should the solicitors of Ireland be deprived of any share in these appointments?

Lord Stanley: They have their chance under the Bill as it stands.

The Marquess of Clanricarde: They had a chance—but why should they not have a right? Her Majesty's Government had no influence in Ireland. There were influence and power possessed by the Repeal Association, and by a strong knot of Orangemen in that country; but in what part of the country, he would ask, was Her Majesty's Government strong, or possessed of influence? And yet they now came forward to insult gratuitously a class which was one of the most influential in all countries, but which was peculiarly so in Ireland. Every drop in the cup—already, he was sorry to say, extremely full of discontent and dissatisfaction—was of importance in the present condition of Ireland. The solicitors of Dublin did not ask for this matter as a boon or a favour. They demanded as a right to be placed on the same footing as the solicitors of England with respect to the provisions of this Bill. As the Bill now stood, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland might appoint his coachman, or his footman, or any person whatever to this office; and when they looked to the history of Ireland, it should not be regarded altogether as a gratuitous assertion to state that it was possible some English favourite might be brought over to perform the duties of the office. If they looked to the Church, or to the law, or even to minor officers, such as the appointment of architects under the Board of Works, they would find that Englishmen had been constantly preferred to appointments in Ireland, and yet he would, if allowed, wish to remind their Lordships that in this very profession of the law, when the question arose of bringing over a distinguished Irish lawyer to this country, of the feeling which was exhibited among the Members of the English Bar. Were the Irish solicitors, then, he would ask, not justified in looking forward to the possibility of an Englishman being brought over to fill this office? He had the honour of receiving more than one communication on the subject, and he knew the solicitors of Dublin to be extremely dissatisfied with the Bill as it now stood; and if his noble Friend had not moved his Amendment, he (the Marquess of Clanricarde) would undoubtedly have done so. He would conclude by again cautioning the Government against creating distinctions which would give cause for great dissatisfaction among a most influential and most respectable class, who might prove to be very dangerous enemies to the Government.

The Lord Chancellor wished to be allowed one word of explanation. He believed the solicitors of Ireland to be a respectable, and worthy, and able body; but he, at the same time, felt that in legislating they ought to guard against the possibility of abuse.

Lord Langdale said, he believed that this appointment ought to be given to solicitors, who had peculiar qualifications in addition to others which they had in common with barristers; and he had no doubt but that there could be found among that class a sufficient number of men of ample integrity, influence, and respectability, and having the advantage of long acquaintance and familiarity with the subject, to undertake the duties of the office. He would not have broken through his general rule of not troubling their Lordships with any remarks, if direct reference had not been made to him by his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, in connexion with the Bill of 1842. He believed his noble and learned Friend entertained the same objection to that Bill on its first introduction which he now felt to the present measure, and that he had been anxious that the offices created under it should be open to barristers and solicitors of a certain number of years' standing. He (Lord Langdale) entered into discussion with the noble and learned Lord on the occasion, and his noble and learned Friend finally consented to have the appointments reserved exclusively for solicitors. He thought it would be a great deal better to adopt the Amendment of the noble Earl, than to continue the principle of the Bill as it now stood. In reference to what had fallen from his noble Friend (the Marquess of Clanricarde), he should beg to remark that it would not be open to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland to appoint a menial, or any such incompetent person to the office, as the Bill expressly stated that the appointment was to be given to a "fit and competent person."

The Earl of St. Germans said, the solicitors of Dublin were, undoubtedly, as they had been described, a very respectable and numerous body; but still it should not be forgotten that for every one solicitor practising in Dublin there were at least twenty in this metropolis, and therefore the comparison drawn between them did not exactly hold. He had very great pleasure in expressing his concurrence in what had fallen from the noble Marquess respecting the solicitors of Ireland being a very respectable body. At the same time, he thought it should be borne in mind that the exclusive appointment of solicitors to this office in England was confined to the Court of Chancery, and that noble Lords —if their argument were worth anything —ought to move for a measure to restrict all other Courts in a similar manner. With regard to the imputation cast upon his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, he would venture to say that there was no man in that House who would be less capable of departing from the correct line of his duty for the purpose of appointing any connexion of his own, than was Sir Edward Sugden.

The Marquess of Clanricarde begged to remind the noble Earl who had just sat down, that though there was a disproportion between the number of solicitors in the two countries, there was also a difference between the appointments to these offices. In Ireland there was to be but one officer appointed under this Bill, while in England the number filling similar appointments was six.

The Lord Chancellor wished to remark, in consequence of what had fallen from his noble and learned Friend (Lord Langdale), that the Bill of 1842, as originally drawn, confined the appointments to solicitors, when he (the Lord Chancellor) had proposed to amend it by adding barristers of a certain standing. It was drawn, he believed, under the superintendence of his noble and learned Friend; and after more than one conversation between them on the subject, he (the Lord Chancellor) yielded with reluctance to his noble and learned Friend's opinion, and consented that barristers should not be included; but he did so solely in consequence of the great attention which that noble and learned Lord had given to the subject.

Lord Campbell said, he hoped his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack would yield once more.

The Lord Chancellor said, if their Lordships decided on not passing this Amendment, it was his intention to propose another, that the office should be open to solicitors and barristers of a certain standing.

The Earl of Wicklow wished to remind his noble Friend near him (the Earl of St. Germans), that though the Bill of 1842 was, as he had stated, confined to the Court of Chancery alone, and did not include the Courts of Law, the present Bill was also confined to the Court of Chancery in Ireland. He would candidly confess that he thought it was an act of madness on the part of Her Majesty's Government to persist in their opposition to this Amendment; and he could not bring himself to believe that his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) would continue to do so. He and those who supported him merely required to assimilate the law in the two countries, and not a single reason had been adduced to show why that assimilation should not take place. Was it, he would ask, because the people of Ireland were unreasonable in some demands, that they were to be denied what was just and reasonable in others? He only asked his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack to forego his opinion in this case, as he admitted he had done on another. If he did not, he would, he promised him, give offence, not only on his own part, but on that of the Government with which he was connected; he would be doing an act of injustice, and be creating disaffection among a most influential class in Ireland.

Amendment negatived.

The Lord Chancellor then moved an Amendment, that the appointment should be confined to barristers-at-law of not less than ten years' standing, or solicitors of not less than ten years' practice.

The Earl of Ellenborough said, he trusted some attempt would be made in the next Session to assimilate the law of the two countries in this matter.

Amendment agreed to, and other Amendments. Bill passed.

The late Piracy Case.] The Earl of Fortescue said, as he was upon his legs, he would wish to ask his noble Friend opposite (the Secretary for the Colonies) a question which he was aware did not come exactly within his Department, but on which he was, perhaps, prepared to give an answer. It related to the sentence which had been lately passed, at the assizes at Exeter, on seven foreigners, who had been there tried and found guilty of piracy. He understood there were some grave questions of international law involved in the case, and that doubts existed in the minds of a large portion of the legal profession, as well as of the public at large, as to the legality of the sentence. He understood a representation had been made by the Minister of Brazil to the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and the question which he wished to put, in order to satisfy the anxiety existing in the public mind on this subject, was, whether Her Majesty's Government were fully satisfied of the legality of the sentence with reference to the question of international law involved in it, or whether it would not be better for them to advise that the prerogative of the Crown should be exercised for the purpose of suspending the execution of the sentence until they had satisfied themselves on the matter by the decision of all the Judges respecting it.

Lord Stanley said, however heinous might be the offence of which these foreigners had been guilty, he concurred with the noble Earl in thinking it desirable that there should not be the slightest doubt of the legality of the sentence. He had had a communication with his noble Friend since the noble Lord opposite had been kind enough to give him notice of his question, and he had to inform him that, doubts having arisen as to the legality of the sentence, the opinion of the Judges would be taken upon it, and of course the prisoners would be respited during the discussion.

Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Bill.] The Earl of Hardwicke moved the consideration of the Report of the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Bill.

The Duke of Richmond proposed that the Bill be recommitted. The Board of Trade had reported in favour of the Guildford Line, and the Committee of their Lordships had decided in favour of the Direct London and Portsmouth line, without hearing the evidence in favour of the Guildford line. Such a course was contrary to the principles of English justice, and would establish a very bad precedent; he should therefore persist in his Motion that the Bill before the House be recommitted.

The Marquess of Northampton, as a Member of the Select Committee to whom the Bill before their Lordships had been referred, defended the course which the Committee had adopted. The Committee had made a Special Report, in order to enable the House to come to an early decision on the subject. They were anxious to have the directions of the House whether they should hear the evidence in favour of the Guildford line or not. If the noble Duke had consented to have the evidence printed when the matter was brought before their Lordships nine days ago, the House might have come to a determination before this. Their Lordships would not now be justified in taking the decision of the case out of the hands of the five Judges, whom they had selected as disinterested parties, and who had decided that the promoters of the Guildford line had no locus standi. The noble Marquess proceeded to discuss the relative merits of the two lines, and contended that the course which the Committee had adopted was the only one, under the circumstances, which they could pursue. He should oppose the Motion of the noble Lord.

The Earl of Devon said, the Guildford line was not now directly before the House, but certainly Committees ought to have all parties before them, and to consider all proper information. The Committee in this case thought the conduct of the parties in question precluded them from being heard. There was a great difference between a Committee deciding after hearing all parties, and a Committee coming to a decision after excluding one of the competing plans.

The Earl of Lovelace trusted their Lordships would not reverse the decision of the Committee. If the noble Duke had moved an instruction to the Committee eight or ten days ago, the matter might have been reconsidered; but at this late period of the Session to recommit the Bill, would be virtually to defeat it altogether.

The Earl of Wicklow regretted that earlier notice had not been given of this application on the part of the petitioners, and that any delay should have occurred in the printing of the evidence of the competing lines. But was this a fatal error? In his opinion it was. The Committee believed that there was an amalgamation of the parties; but there was no evidence of that fact. He thought there was yet sufficient time to reconsider the subject.

The Earl of Hardwicke said, the Committee had endeavoured to do their duty in the best way they could. In the case which was brought under their consideration, the question was not as to the necessity of considering any competing lines, but those lines which were brought before them by arrangement. The Bills contained clauses drawn in such a way as left no doubt that they were the effect of some arrangement between the parties creating the Bills. The parties who made the complaint had many opportunities of bringing forward their objections before the Committee on those clauses, if they had thought proper to do so. As to the possibility of re-opening the question with a view of settling it this Session, from what he himself saw in the Committee, he was quite sure that the lawyers and those other parties who were interested, would take good care that the Session should close without coming to any final arrangement.

Lord Beaumont said, the question before their Lordships was simply whether these parties could appear before them in two different characters; for they now took a different position to that which they had occupied on a former occasion. It was now contended that they were entitled to be heard by the Committee, as being the promoters of a competing line; but there was no competing project brought before the Committee. There was no competing project; the petitioners were parties to a distinct Bill, and they had already been heard. If their Lordships acceded to the Amendment, they would be establishing a most ridiculous precedent—that of allowing persons to appear both as parties to the Bill, and as opponents to it.

Lord Redesdale supported the Amendment.

The Marquess of Clanricarde was also in favour of the Amendment, but if it should be rejected, he then thought the petition ought to be referred to a Select Committee.

The Earl of Haddington considered, that everything depended upon the question, whether this was a competing line or not. If the petitioners agreed to take scrip, and so far acquiesced in the Bill, then they could not afterwards be considered as competing parties; but if the House of Commons had taken the three Bills, and had amalgamated them as they thought fit, without the consent of the parties, then he thought it was hard that the parties should be excluded from being heard against the Bill. He should like to hear from some noble Lord who was a Member of the Committee, whether it was the impression of the Committee that there had been any compromise between the parties?

The Duke of Richmond could undertake to declare, on the part of the South Western Company, that no compromise was ever made by them. The thing had never been even hinted at by any of its opponents. The fact was, the House of Commons took the three Bills, and cut and carved them as they thought proper, and the Guildford line had no power to oppose the insertion of these clauses.

The Duke of Grafton opposed the Amendment.

After a few words more from the Duke of Richmond,

Their Lordships divided:—Contents 13; Non-contents 11: Majority 2.

Bill re-committed.

Valuation (Ireland) Bill.] Lord Stanley moved the Second Reading of this Bill, which he characterized as of great importance, dealing with a subject which had been fully discussed in the other House; and which had been sent up with the almost unanimous approval and consent of its Members. The postponement of the measure would be of great practical inconvenience. The noble Lord here entered into a short statement of the principles and objects of the Bill, which, not having a retrospective effect, was designed to place the lands in counties upon a more perfect system of valuation than they were at present.

Lord Monteagle declared, that he rose under a deep conviction that it would be most rash—injurious to the interests of Ireland—injurious to the character of that House, and injurious to the character of Her Majesty's Ministers, if under circumstances it were possible for the present or any other Government to persevere in a Bill like the present. They stood in that House on the 4th day of August: he believed that there were present at that moment nine Peers representing the whole peerage of the Empire, and of those nine, he believed that only four were connected with Ireland; and yet, under those circumstances, their Lordships were called upon to pass a Bill having relation to Ireland, which if it were presented at the very commencement of the Session with respect to England, would require the utmost care and caution, and the most extended inquiry. Their Lordships would hardly believe the real importance of this question. This was a Bill to alter the whole system of local taxation in Ireland. From the liberality of Parliament, the people of Ireland had been very much relieved from direct taxation for the State. What the people there felt was local taxation; and upon the mode in which it was collected, and the system by which it was raised, their comfort, happiness, and well-being depended, infinitely more than upon many of the Bills which were brought before their Lordships. First, there was the grand jury tax, amounting to upwards of a million; and then there was the tax of the poor rate. Those were the taxes which pressed upon the occupying tenantry of the country, and yet, on the 4th day of August, without examination, without inquiry, the House was called upon to alter every existing arrangement, and to adopt a course which, in respect of such a measure, was, he apprehended, wholly without precedent. Why, the Bill they were called upon to read the second time, was actually wet from the press. It had not been delivered to Peers that morning. He really did not desire to use strong language; but if ever there had been an insult offered to a country, it would be the perseverance in this Bill on the part of the Government. There was not one of their Lordships present who did not know that the Government would not dare to press such a Bill, under such circumstances, affecting any other part of the kingdom. Upon what principle, then, was it to be pressed upon Ireland? If ever there was an insult offered to Ireland, it would be by persevering in such a Bill as the present at such a period; and he did not think Her Majesty's Government would dare to introduce such a measure with reference to any other part of the kingdom under similar circumstances. So short was the time which elapsed since it had been introduced into the House, that even his noble Friend, with all his great mental powers, had not been able to master its details, and did not seem to understand either the provisions or the principles of the Bill. Already had the country been at an expense of more than one million in surveying and valuing Ireland, and was it expedient to have all that money thrown away? They were not called upon to undo all that had been done. Any measure more calculated to impede the progress of improvement in Ireland he did not think it possible for the worst enemies of that country to devise. One of its effects would be to prevent improvements from being made, because these would be immediately subjected to taxation, and made the object of a new valuation.

Lord Stanley observed, that the noble Lord seemed to misconceive the object of the Bill. Inasmuch as two valuations were now necessary in Ireland, one for the purposes of the Poor Laws, and another for grand jury assessments, this Bill enabled the valuations to be made by one officer, instead of by two separate officers.

Lord Monteagle continued to think that that valuation which had gone on so satisfactorily in the north of Ireland should be applied generally. For twenty-one years they had been legislating on this subject, and they had never thought it advisable to adopt the principle involved in the present Bill until now. It was said, indeed, that they had the consent of the Irish Members in the other House. He would just ask how many Irish Members had been present when the Bill had gone through the House of Commons? But what was the case really with respect to this Bill? It had been four times printed, and nearly as often recommitted. And yet this was the Bill which their Lordships were called upon to swallow at one gulp on the 4th of August. Now there could be no inconvenience whatever in postponing until next Session the present measure; and if he could not touch their feelings of justice, he would appeal to their compassion, not to attempt to force a Bill like that at such a period of the Session, through such a thin House. A proper system of valuation might yet be made the foundation of a franchise in Ireland, and though forbearing to enter more deeply into that question at present, he would urge that too, as an additional argument for giving this Bill a more mature consideration.

The Earl of St. Germans confessed he had heard with some surprise the speech of the noble Lord who had just sat down, and who seemed to think that this Bill was an emanation of the present Government. If the noble Lord had referred to the evidence upon which the Bill was framed, he could not have thought so. He would have seen at once that a Committee composed of Irish Members of the other House of Parliament had been appointed last Session to investigate fully into this subject; that they had examined a great number of witnesses conversant with the full details of the matter; and the present Bill had been the result of the recommendation of that Committee. There had been amongst the Members of that Committee an unanimous conviction that some such measure as the present was necessary, and it had been accordingly actually agreed upon by the great body of Irish Members in the other House of Parliament, and in addition to that recommendation, it had the approval of the recent Land Commission. At the present moment there was a difference of 40 or 50 per cent. in the rate of the valuation under the Poor Law, in many of the Unions in Ireland, and it had been considered most advisable and equitable to endeavour to secure a uniform system. It was not fair to charge his noble Friend near him with endeavouring to force that Bill through a thin House; because noble Lords having an interest in Ireland did not think proper, as might be supposed their duty, as long as Parliament was sitting, to attend in their places when anything concerning that country was likely to be discussed. But such as the Bill was, it had been approved of by a Committee of Irish Members, composed of Sir Denham Norreys, Lord Jocelyn, Mr. Shaw, Mr. French, Sir H. Barron, and others; and for his part he conceived it would do much good, instead of the evil the noble Lord prognosticated of it in Ireland. Under these circumstances he hoped his noble Friend opposite would reserve his objections to the Bill until it was in Committee, when he had no doubt his noble Friend near him would be prepared to answer them.

The Earl of Wicklow said, that the first question which had occurred to him on the present occasion was, whether the House of Lords was of any use? If it was of use, then he must say that the present was a most extraordinary mode of proceeding. He objected to forcing through so important a Bill in the manner described. He did not object to it because that happened to be the 4th of August, but because they had not time to consider it before the prorogation. There was no compulsion on the Ministers to prorogue Parliament either that week or the next. In general, Parliament sat to a much later period; and it was their duty to do so as long as there was business of importance to be disposed of. It appeared that they were to be prorogued at the end of the week. The noble Lord had urged that as an argument for proceeding with the measure, while in fact it proved that the noble Lord did not consider it necessary that important Bills should undergo consideration in that House. In his opinion the noble Lord ought at once to postpone the measure. The noble Lord said, that it might not be so easy to pass it through the other House in the next Session. But that was just another reason for delaying it. Independent of these considerations, there was the fact that none of their Lordships had had time even to read the Bill. The noble Lord had said, that the Bill had been supported in the other House by a great majority of the Irish Members. According to the reports which he had seen, he believed it had been opposed by them both in its principle and in its details. He thought Government ought not to persist with the Bill in opposition to every Irish Peer present, and that further time ought to be given for fairly considering it.

Lord Stanley hoped their Lordships would believe, that he had not brought forward the question at that period out of any disrespect to their Lordships, or with any desire that they should not have the fullest opportunity of discussing it. He was fully aware of the inconvenience of bringing forward such a measure at that period of the Session, and he was also aware that unless it met with a general concurrence of opinion in its favour, there would be little chance of carrying it. There would certainly be great inconvenience in postponing the Bill, and great expense would be involved in such a postponement. If the measure were postponed, it would only be to be again introduced in the other House next Session. He regretted that it had not met with the approval of the noble Lords connected with Ireland. Both the noble Lords opposite and the noble Earl near him, had intimated their intention to oppose the future progress of the Bill; and it would, therefore, be impossible for him to persist with the Bill during the present Session. Sensible of the immense inconvenience, the increased expense, and the great evil of postponing the measure, he, nevertheless, felt that, under the circumstances, he should not be warranted in further pressing it on their Lordships' consideration.

The Marquess of Clanricarde expressed his acknowledgments to the noble Lord for the course he had taken.

Lord Monteagle said, that the noble Lord had acted wisely and discreetly in postponing the Bill. Early next Session the Bill might be calmly and well considered.

Bill accordingly withdrawn.

House adjourned.

Phillips, from Journeymen Tailors of Ashton-under-Lyne, and Manchester, for Inquiry into the Sanatory Condition of their Trade.

London and York Railway—Fictitious Signatures.] Mr. Hawes presented a petition from the Chairman of the Cambridge and Lincoln Railway Company, a gentleman who stated that he had an interest in the London and York Railway. The object of the petition was to impute very extensive frauds in the concoction of the subscription list. The petitioner stated that his attention and the attention of other parties was only called to this subject on Thursday last, and that the result of his inquiries had been that subscribers to the amount of half a million sterling appeared in the contract deed by fictitious names or a fictitious description of places of abode; and that the petitioner could prove the above facts. The petition then contained a long list of names and figures, with the sums for which the parties had subscribed. The petitioner stated that he was pursuing his inquiries into the bonâ fides of the subscription list, and did not doubt that he should discover numerous other instances of fraud, besides those which were specifically alleged. He prayed the House to institute an inquiry, and to afford him an opportunity of proving the allegations of the petition before a Select Committee. As the third reading of the Bill was to take place to-day, and as it was not likely that the House would often meet again, he moved that the petition be printed with the Votes to-morrow.

Mr. B. Denison said, that the hon. Member for Lambeth had done him the honour to show him the petition. It was quite impossible for him to say whether the signatures were correctly stated or not; one signature, however, did catch his eye, and that was the signature of a most respectable solicitor residing in London, who, although it was stated that he was not competent to pay his subscription contract, was, to his knowledge, perfectly competent to pay six times the sum standing opposite his name. The name was Michael Thomas Baxter. This proceeding had been going on for some days, and he held in his hand a circular signed by a person who called himself a parliamentary agent.

The Speaker: Does the hon. Member object to the petition being printed with the Votes?

Mr. B. Denison replied that he objected to it, and he also objected to the Motion of which the hon. Member had given notice. Supposing all that was contained in the petition to be true, there was another tribunal before which the subscription deed would go, which was competent to inquire into it; and he submitted that this was a wrong time to bring forward a petion of this sort, and he hoped the House would not lend itself to this mode of stopping the further progress of the Bill. He had not the slightest objection to the accuracy of the deed being inquired into; he was willing, if there were fictitious signatures, that the whole thing should be exposed. The utmost pains were taken to ascertain the respectability and responsibility of every person who signed the deed. The circular to which he alluded was headed "urgent," and was addressed to the postmaster of Lincoln, and signed by E. Croucher, parliamentary agent. He strongly suspected that all parliamentary agents were, to a great extent, under the control of the Speaker; and he meant to ask whether it was not a breach of privilege to send a circular of this description? It stated that an investigation was pending before the House of Lords; that extensive frauds and forgeries had been discovered, and requested information to be sent whether letters had been delivered to certain parties, specifying the names of persons in the neighbourhood. On inquiry it turned out that this was a circular which had been sent to almost every town in the kingdom in which it was supposed that any person resided who had become a subscriber to the London and York Railway. He was in a condition to prove that parties had been going about London, within the last forty-eight hours, stating that they were authorized by the House of Lords to make inquiries as to A. B. C. In this way the case was got up to stop the progress of the London and York Railway. It was only a repetition of various attempts of a similar character, with which he need not trouble the House. Even during the sitting of the Committee, expedients were resorted to to wear out the time of the Committee and the directors; and he believed this to be a part of the same proceeding. He therefore, objected to an inquiry being instituted at this the eleventh hour, on the day fixed for the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. Hawes did not think that the hon. Member had assigned any good grounds for opposing the printing of the petition. The hon. Member said that the petitioner had used improper means to make various inquiries. He knew nothing of the parties who were promoting the line, or who were opposing it. He had had no sort of communication, direct or indirect, with them. This petition had been brought to him by a most respectable gentleman, and was signed by a most respectable gentleman. He was informed that the gross sum impugned by the petitioners amounted to 658,000*l.* Of that there was 200,000*l.* of fictitious signatures, and 458,000*l.* by parties who were wholly irresponsible. He stated this on the best possible evidence, which had satisfied his mind that the facts ought to be disclosed to the House of Commons. As to this being the last stage of the Bill, the House would recollect that on a recent occasion the objection to the signatures was not taken before the Standing Orders' Committee, or after the second reading of the Bill, but when it came before the House of Lords. One of the signatures was that of a gentleman, whose address was stated to be Finsbury-square, who signed for 25,000*l.* No such person was known, although inquiries were made of all the general and twopenny postmen. Then there were the names of John Theobold, and John Taylor, who signed for 1,200*l.*; and the mistress of the house stated that she knew nothing of him. Another gentleman, who signed for 5,000*l.*, turned out to be receiving alms from the Charterhouse. Then there were the names of collectors of the Treasury, excise officers, widows, and persons in all situations of life; but no trace could be found of their locality, nor was there any proof of the ability of these persons to fulfil the contracts they had signed. He had not the smallest interest in the matter, directly or indirectly. Two hours ago he should have given his vote on general principles in support of the Bill; but when respectable parties impugned the subscription contract and said that there was 650,000*l.* of fraudulent or fictitious signatures, could hon. Members turn their backs on the petitioners, and refuse inquiry?

Mr. Bernal knew nothing of this line, but he knew enough of railways to say that with all the safeguards which the House might think proper to adopt, they could not put a stop to stockjobbing; they could not put an end to gambling day by day, and the mischief that must arise from such a system as this. He had no doubt that the hon. Member was convinced of the truth of the facts stated in the petition; but let it be recollected that he came later than the eleventh hour. If he thought that he was depriving the hon. Member of his remedy, he would not oppose his Motion; but there was another tribunal more competent than the House of Commons, and if they refused this Motion, they did not deprive the parties of any relief to which they might be entitled. The House of Lords could examine witnesses upon oath—an advantage which the House of Commons did not possess. Why had not the parties discovered these facts before the third reading of the Bill? It would be difficult to assemble a Committee of the Commons at this time of the Session, but in the other House they had little to do. The hon. Member might abandon his Motion with safety without depriving his clients of their remedy.

Mr. Roebuck said, that the question was, not whether fraud had been practised on the directors of the companies, but whether fraud had been practised on the House of Commons? Some time ago the House had passed an Irish Bill, the famous Galway Bill; that was taken to the House of Lords, and there subjected to a peculiar ordeal. It was discovered, after the House of Commons had passed it, that they had been performing their onerous duties in vain, and that one-half of the list was fictitious. What was sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander; what was law for Ireland, ought to be law for England. The Galway Bill had been turned out for a fraud which was discovered in the House of Lords; but here a fraud was discovered in the House of Commons. It was not proved, certainly; but the House of Commons was now exactly in the position in which the House of Lords was when the fraud was discovered. What did the House of Lords do? They did not say "You have come too late." They said "You have presented a petition which makes such imputations and involves such interests, that we must inquire." When the same imputations were made as to an English Bill, should the House of Commons say, "We will not inquire, let the Lords inquire." Was not this abrogating their functions? It was said that the House of Lords could examine upon oath; but they refused to allow a prosecution for evidence given under that oath. In the case of the Galway Railway, amongst other evidence was that of the secretary to the company, who said that most careful inquiries had been made into the list, and that nobody had been admitted who was not proved to be a respectable person, and yet it turned out that 500,000*l.* had been subscribed by paupers.

Mr. Ward said, that if the House sanctioned this objection, no Railway Bill would pass before the close of the Session; they should give this Bill fair play. If the respectability of the shareholders of the London and York Railway could be impugned, let the matter be sifted in the House of Lords. Three or four days only of the Session remained, so that it was utterly impossible to make an inquiry in this House. He had to inform the hon. Member, that in consequence of the notice he had given of this Motion, the shares of one line had risen, and the shares of the other had fallen, so that his public virtue might be made an instrument in the hands of opposing parties. He should vote against the Motion, in the expectation that there would be a most searching inquiry in the House of Lords.

Mr. Darby stated, that the original share list was before the Committee; that every word of the deed was discussed and commented upon, and yet not a hint was thrown out against the responsibility of the shareholders.

Petition to be printed.

Mr. B. Denison then moved that the London and York Railway Bill be read a Third Time,

Mr. Hawes would take that opportunity of answering a question which had been put to him by the hon. Gentleman. Before the Committee of the House of Lords it had been said that the subscription list of the London and York Company was unimpeachable, and it was only on Thursday last that the petitioner had been made aware that such was not the fact, and he was still pursuing his inquiries. He fully believed that the Standing Orders' Committee were afforded no opportunity of looking into the matter—all the companies had joined in a compromise so that each should abstain from impeaching the subscription list of the other. The parties who waited upon him were respectable, and he believed that the allegations they had made were true, and, as far as he was concerned, he would assist them in sifting the matter to the bottom.

Mr. Roebuck would move that the Bill be read a third time on that day three months, and he did so on the ground that the House had determined that certain things should be done before a Railway Bill should be proceeded in—that a subscription list should be put in, and that it should be a bonâ fide one. If the Standing Orders were of no use, let them be abrogated; but so long as they formed part and parcel of the orders of the House, let them form part of the proceedings on these Bills. It was directly asserted that the Bill which they were then called upon to read a third time, had been carried through all its stages under a fraudulent pretence. Of course, he did not mean to say for a moment that the hon. Member for Yorkshire was any party to the fraud; but fraud was alleged, and it was not attempted to be denied. [Mr. Denison dissented.] It was all very well to shake the head, but would they go before a Committee and prove that the allegations were false? The gigantic frauds which had been practised in railways was something new—it had come upon them like a thunder-clap. With, perhaps, some half-dozen exceptions, the whole House were dabblers in railway shares. You could not meet a man but he was full of the price of shares; nay, you could not meet even a woman in society, who was not learned in the value of scrip. It was altogether a monstrous phenomenon. The House had now some grounds to go upon. Let them fully inquire into the allegations of the petitioners, and if they were found true let them take steps to put an end to the monstrous system altogether. Suppose they were to postpone the Bill; it might be inconvenient to some parties, but where was the harm to the public if the Bill should be delayed until next Session? It was asserted that the parties promoting the Bill had practised fraud upon the House, yet the House was about to be asked to suspend the Standing Orders, in order that it should be enabled to pass—it was monstrous. He moved that the third reading of the Bill be postponed for three months.

Mr. W. Patten would vote for the third reading of the Bill, because he considered that it would be unjust to throw it over at that late period of the Session. A Committee had sat eighty days, he believed, upon the Bill; they had fully investigated it, and their labours ought not now to be thrown aside. If the House should agree to do so, he certainly would never serve upon a railway committee, except upon compulsion. He really did not know what measures it was in the power of the House to take to prevent such frauds, if they had not been successful in the case of the London and York line, with which he was wholly unconnected. But, even if the allegations of the petition were true—if the whole 600,000*l.* had been fraudulently subscribed for, still there would remain a sufficient subscription list to answer all the requirements of the Standing Orders. Under all the circumstances, he would vote for the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. Aglionby: The House and the country were very much deceived if they thought that the Standing Orders of the House afforded any sufficient protection against frauds of the description pointed out in the petition. When Bills went before the Committee upon petitions, the agents mutually agreed to wave all dispute upon the subscription lists, well knowing that any inquiry would most probably be fatal to all the Bills. He believed that frauds which had been practised upon the House during the present Session had been very flagrant, and he was most anxious that they should be able to find some mode of checking them. In respect to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Bath, he trusted there were many more than six hon. Members who were not tainted with the railway mania; for himself he had no connexion with any railway whatever, nor would he ever have, while the House chose to place him in the responsible and judicial situation of a Member of the Standing Orders' Committee.

Mr. Ward said, that he considered it highly desirable that men of known honour, integrity, and capacity, should be openly and avowedly interested in enterprises from which the public derived so much benefit as from railways. He had himself been a railway director for ten years; and so long as he saw those concerns with which he was connected conducted with propriety, he should not be ashamed to avow his participation in them.

Amendment withdrawn. Bill was read a third time and passed.

Westminster Bridge.] Sir R. Inglis, seeing his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury in his place, begged to be allowed to put a question to him relative to the state of Westminster Bridge, and the intention of Her Majesty's Government with respect to it. In order to make his question intelligible, perhaps the House would indulge him with permission to say a few words by way of preliminary explanation. Gentlemen would, perhaps, recollect that last year a Committee was appointed to inquire into the condition of the bridge. They took evidence upon it, and, amongst other testimony, received the opinions of several distinguished engineers — Mr. Rendel, Mr. George Rennie, Mr. Payne, Mr. Wm. Cubitt, and, by letter, of Sir John Rennie. These gentlemen all concurred in the opinion that, for engineering and architectural purposes, it was desirable that the present structure should be removed. Two gentlemen gave a contrary opinion. Mr. Walker, the architect, and Mr. Cubitt, the contractor for the repair of the bridge. The Committee did not concur in the opinion of the five gentlemen whose names he had enumerated; and the Commissioners of Westminster Bridge proceeded, at their own expense, to make repairs which, according to the evidence, could not place the bridge in an effective condition. Under these circumstances the House separated last year, the Committee concurring in the view of the minority; but, in the course of the winter, additional injuries occurred to the bridge, which rendered its state still more unsatisfactory, and he therefore wished to ask the Government, in the person of his right hon. Friend the First Minister, whether the subject had been already under the consideration of the Government, and what were their intentions with respect to the continuance of repairs at an enormous expense, and which were ineffectual for the complete restoration of the structure; or whether they contemplated the pulling down of the bridge and rebuilding it, either at the present spot, or at the other side of the new Palace of Westminster?

Sir R. Peel, in answer to the question of his hon. Friend, begged to remind the House that a Committee had been appointed last Session to inquire into the state of Westminster Bridge, and he believed that the Committee, by a small majority, decided, upon a review of the whole of the evidence, there was no case upon which to recommend the pulling down of the bridge, and building a new one. The facts he believed to be these—that the Commissioners for superintending the bridge, were in possession of certain estates, which, if converted into capital, would represent a sum of 172,000*l.* Two estimates for rebuilding the bridge had been laid before the Committee, one from Mr. Walker, and the other from Mr. Rennie; the one stating the amount at 260,000*l.*, and the other at 350,000*l.*, independent of the approaches. He understood that since the Report of the Committee, the Commissioners who had the charge of the bridge had taken fresh evidence, and had called for reports from the engineers and others immediately connected with the bridge, Mr. Walker and Mr. Cubitt, and had also received the opinions of Mr. Rennie and Mr. Rendel, and other independent engineers. These opinions had been sent to the Board of Treasury; but having been so sent only within the last three days, it had been impossible to give them the consideration which so important a subject required; and he was only enabled to state to his hon. Friend, that as soon as the labours of that House were brought to a close, the recent communication from the Commissioners to the Board of Treasury should receive due attention. He was not prepared at present to go further, or to state that the Government thought that the rebuilding the bridge, at an expense of 350,000*l.*, would be consistent with a due regard for the interests of the public.

Murder of Mr. Palmer, of the Wasp.] Mr. Christie rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, to the case of the seven foreigners who were recently tried at the Exeter assizes, for the murder of Mr. Thomas Palmer, a midshipman, belonging to Her Majesty's ship the Wasp, and who, the hon. Member said, he understood were to be executed on Friday next. On the trial of these men several points were raised by counsel on their behalf, and one of these was quite a new one, in respect of which counsel on neither side was prepared with any authority. The Judge (Mr. Baron Platt) overruled the objections, and refused to reserve them for the consideration of his brother Judges; and he (Mr. Christie) now wished to ask the right hon. Baronet whether, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, and looking at the fact that the lives of seven of our fellow creatures, and these seven foreigners, were dependent on that decision, the right hon. Gentleman deemed it to be inconsistent with his duty to advise Her Majesty to exercise Her prerogative, and respite the unhappy men, in order that the opinion of the Judges might be obtained on the points raised?

Sir J. Graham admitted that the question put by the hon. Gentleman was a most important one. He begged to state in reply that he had that morning heard from Mr. Baron Platt, who informed him that, after full consultation with his brother Judge, Mr. Justice Erle, who was on the same circuit with him, and considering the gravity of the question and all the circumstances of the case, besides the fact that the lives of seven persons were at stake, he (Mr. Baron Platt) had determined to reserve the point of law, which had been raised on the trial, for the consideration of the other Judges. Upon this being communicated to the Government, a respite was at once issued.

New Zealand.] Mr. P. Howard asked, whether any, and what, arrangements had been made by the Government with the New Zealand Company, and whether the Government would inform the House more generally what had been done with respect to the Colony itself? It was not desirable that the prorogation should take place without some statement being made public as to what had been done.

Mr. G. W. Hope regretted that the hon. Gentleman had not mentioned to him before coming down to the House that he was about to put the question, as he (Mr. G. W. Hope) would then have been able to give him more than a general answer. All he could say at present was, that the New Zealand Company had made fresh proposals to the noble Lord at the head of the Colonial Office; that he himself (Mr. G. W. Hope) had seen deputations from the Company two or three times on those proposals; they had also seen a third person at the Colonial Office on the subject; and that those proposals were still under the consideration of the Colonial Office.

The South-Eastern Railway Company.] Viscount Palmerston said: On behalf of the South-Eastern Railway Company, I beg to offer a few words in explanation of what fell from me on the other evening. I had been informed that the reason why the engines used on that line were too weak to perform their duty, which made it necessary to have an additional engine to propel each train behind, was mistaken economy on the part of the directors of the Company. But I have since been waited on by a deputation of the directors of the Company, and they have assured me that the reason was not a mistaken economy, but a mistaken calculation, and that the persons who were directors at the time to which I referred are not directors now. They further said, that in October last, on finding that their engines were too weak, they gave directions for the construction of fresh engines. I told them that I should make this explanation to the House of Commons; but at the same time I told them I thought it was my duty to say that their explanation did not, in my opinion, afford a justification of their conduct; but that if their engines were too weak, they ought to have proportioned their trains to the strength of their engines, instead of putting two engines, one before and one behind. I am sorry to add, that from their own showing, it appears that they still resort to this dangerous practice of putting two engines to propel one train; for they assure me that it is only done on a part of the road which is very steep; and, whenever the measure is adopted, the train is not allowed to go at more than ten or twelve, or from that to fifteen miles an hour. Now, I am not an engineer, but it does appear to me that that rate is too fast under such circumstances. I think that if there is a necessity for two engines, they ought to be placed both before the train, and not one before and the other after the train; but that if a pushing or a propelling engine is attached behind, the rate of travelling ought not to be more than four miles an hour.

The Case of William Mays.] Mr. Tufnell asked whether William Mays, who had been convicted, at the Northampton Lent Assizes, of an assault, with intent to do grievous bodily harm to a gamekeeper, was to be pardoned or not?

Sir J. Graham said, it was not by any means convenient that he, as Secretary of State, should be called upon to state the advice which he was prepared to offer to the Sovereign with respect to the exercise of the Royal prerogative; but he would say, in reply to the hon. Gentleman's question, that the prisoner William Mays was tried and convicted before Lord Chief Justice Tindal, at the last Spring Assizes, and by him sentenced to fifteen years' transportation. That period, with the concurrence and by the advice of Lord Chief Justice Tindal, he (Sir J. Graham) had commuted to seven years, and he had further ordered the prisoner to be detained until the Summer Assizes, when certain other parties who were inculpated for having taken part in the same transaction on which Mays was found guilty, would be tried also. Those parties were tried, but were not convicted. Circumstances, however, came out at their trial that confirmed the impression that had been entertained of the innocence of Mays of the offence of which the jury had found him guilty. The Lord Chief Baron, before whom these parties had been tried, had been so good as to send him his notes of the trial, and he had sent them to Lord Chief Justice Tindal, stating that if he thought the case with this additional light was a satisfactory one, he should advise Her Majesty to grant a free pardon to the convict Mays. He was only waiting for an answer from the learned Judge.

The New Houses of Parliament.] The Earl of Lincoln said, in answer to the question from Mr. Moffatt, it was perfectly true that the anticipations he had entertained and expressed in answer to a question from the hon. Member for Montrose in 1842, to the effect that the new Houses would be ready by this time, had been disappointed; but he begged to remind the House that no great public building, either in this country or any other, had ever made so rapid a progress as the new Houses had done; and when attacks were made upon the architect, he could answer for that gentleman that the attacks made upon him some time ago had rendered him so anxious, that for two months he was obliged to retire from London in order to recruit his health, so keenly did he feel the imputations that had been thrown upon his personal honour in the accusations that had been made against him of not having kept his word. The House of Lords, there was no doubt, would be in a fit state for the occupation of their Lordships at the commencement of the Session of 1847. The House of Commons could be prepared by that time, but not without considerable difficulty, and he was not prepared to say that it would be advisable for the House to insist on its being ready so soon. But the central hall and other parts of the building necessary for the communication between the two Houses, would not be ready by then; and, therefore it would be for the House next Session to consider what it would be best to do. The committee-rooms would be prepared by the commencement of the Session of 1847.

THE BRAZILS.] Mr. M. Gibson said, he could not allow that opportunity, which might be the last he should have this Session, to pass without pressing on the attention of the Government one or two matters which had already been mentioned several times this Session in that House, connected with the commercial interests of this country. The first was, the position in which Englishmen now resident in the Brazils were placed. He wished to remind the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, that the privileges which British subjects resident in the Brazils had enjoyed with reference to the disposal of their property by will, and some other personal rights of great importance, and which expired with the Treaty of November, 1844, had not, although they were enjoyed by the subjects of other foreign countries resident in Brazil, been restored to them. He would, therefore, press particularly on the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, the great importance of endeavouring to procure, that Englishmen resident in the Brazils might at least be in as good a position as the subjects of any Foreign State whatever. At the same time, he did not complain that Englishmen were made subject to Brazilian law. The hon. Member for Salford and himself had received many pressing communications on this subject—one of vital importance to the constituency he represented, as many in that constituency had large property in the Brazils; and he understood that in case of the death of a partner in this country in any of those houses in that country, his goods would be taken possession of by the Brazilian authorities, and would be administered by them, and that large fees, amounting to confiscation of the property, would be exacted. It was understood that an assurance had been given that those privileges would be restored to British subjects, and he believed that Lord Aberdeen was under the impression that a Treaty or arrangement had been come to with the Brazilian Government that British subjects should be placed in the same position as the subjects of France and other foreign countries in reference to those personal rights. The last mails, however, did not bring intelligence that any such negotiation was concluded; and, whether it could be attributed to the unfortunate policy of this country with respect to sugar—to the fact that we had proscribed the staple produce of the Brazils, and placed it in a different position from the same produce of other foreign countries, he could not tell, but it appeared to him that we did stand in a very unfortunate position with the Brazils; that the interests of the commercial classes were in a state of jeopardy, and that Her Majesty's Government had not been fortunate in their negotiations with that Empire. Another question with reference to the same subject which he wished to press on the attention of the Government was the differential duty. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Taunton, the other evening, put a question to the right hon. Baronet, and asked, whether it was true that the Brazilian Government had imposed an additional 20 or 30 per cent. on the rate of duty now leviable under the general tariff, on the cotton manufactures, the produce of Great Britain only; and the right hon. Baronet answered that he had received no intelligence that such was the fact. But he (Mr. Gibson) believed that intelligence which might be relied on had arrived by the last mail, that the Brazilian Government had imposed a discriminating duty of 20 or 30 per cent. on British cotton manufactures over and above the duty upon the cotton manufactures of any other country; and that they would continue that additional duty so long as England continued to proscribe their sugar. He had seen that stated in a Liverpool paper of the 23rd of July last. He did not ask the Government for any assurance or pledge for the future; but he should not be doing his duty to his constituents, if he had allowed that opportunity to pass without pressing such important matters on the attention of the Government. If the deficiency of labour in the West Indies were urged as the ground of monopoly in their favour, then he wished to ask of the Government what steps had been taken to bring about the immigration of labour into the West Indian Colonies? He observed, that the Colonial Assemblies had charged their revenue with a certain amount to pay the interest upon a loan, which it was understood the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies had promised the Colonial Governors should be raised on the security of the Colonial revenue, backed also by the guarantee of the Home Government. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies could inform him whether anything had been done in reference to this matter. The despatches of the noble Lord had been before the public some time, and it was expected that the attention of Parliament would have been called to the consideration of the policy of raising a sum of money on the security of the Home Government for the purpose of promoting immigration into the West Indian Colonies. He would, however, upon that occasion, give no opinion as to the policy of such immigration.

Mr. G. W. Hope said, that the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies had stated, in the despatches to which the hon. Gentleman had referred, that on pressing representations from the West India Colonies, he should not object to the passing of Loan Ordinances, if they deemed them advisable. Those Ordinances had been passed in two or three of the Colonies, whilst others had taken the necessary means of providing for such immigration without resorting to Loan Ordinances.

Sir R. Peel said, he had stated at an early period of the Session, that Plenipotentiaries had been appointed by the Brazilian Government, for the purpose of negotiating such a Treaty as that to which the hon. Gentleman had referred. It was a Treaty not for a tariff, but for giving to British subjects the same privileges as the subjects of other countries possessed. The proceedings, however, of those Plenipotentiaries, unlike the conduct of the Brazilian Government in general, had been very dilatory. In the last accounts from the Brazils, it was stated, that a change had taken place in the Government, and that the Gentleman who was Secretary of State, under whose orders that negotiation was conducted, had been recently moved from that office; and that might, perhaps, have caused the delay. The hon. Gentleman had also referred to the imposition by the Government of the Brazils of an additional duty upon certain British manufactures. He could only say, that, unless the account of the hon. Gentleman had been received within the last few days, he did not think that such was the case; for, although the Minister at the Court of the Brazils had at a recent period written on other subjects, he had not alluded in the most distant manner to any such additional duty having been imposed.

Subject at an end.

Fees for Admission to Public Buildings.] Mr. Hume called the attention of the House to the practice of exacting fees or receiving gratuities from the public as the condition of their admittance to cathedrals and other public buildings; and moved—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the practice of exacting fees from the public as the condition of their admittance to cathedrals, is highly improper, and ought to be discontinued."

He believed, that, the opening of those edifices would greatly conduce to the public benefit, and regretted that no such steps had been taken for that purpose. He considered the practice of taking fees for admission to be disreputable to the country.

Sir R. Peel said, he had always expressed a strong opinion, and felt that there was great advantage from giving as free and unrestricted admission to these noble edifices as was consistent with security to the works of art contained in them. He could not conceive anything more likely to exercise a beneficial influence on the public mind than the free admission to examine such edifices; but due precaution should be taken for securing the monuments and other works of art from injury; although he believed, that, speaking generally, nothing could be more exemplary than the conduct of the great body of the people; and he was speaking of the working classes, because he believed that their conduct had been as exemplary as that of the higher classes; still the hon. Gentleman must be aware, that occasionally it did happen, as in the case of the Portland Vase, and also of some very valuable pictures, that there were exceptions from that general exemplary conduct. He did not mention that as a reason for additional restrictions; but that free admission should not be allowed to the injury of the works of art. That distinguished divine, the late Dean of Westminster, had had an interview with him; and he must say, he believed that it was the wish of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster to give those facilities of admission to the Abbey which they thought they could give consistently with security to the works of art; and he understood that the present Bishop of Ely did give, in pursuance of the promises he made, the fullest consideration to the subject, and that his exertions were constantly directed towards that object. He had now the satisfaction of stating that—not in consequence of the hon. Gentleman's Motion—but in consequence of a communication he had made to the present Dean of Westminster soon after his appointment; and his having stated to him the opinion he had expressed to Dr. Turton, and represented how freely the public had been admitted to the cartoons at Westminster Hall, how exemplary their conduct had been, that there had been no instance of mischief, and that all, had retired with acknowledgments for the opportunity given to them for the inspection of the cartoons—he had a few days since received from Dr. Wilberforce a letter, in which he said—

"As I know your wishes respecting the admission of strangers into the Abbey, I trouble you with a line to say that I have just issued some new directions on that subject. Strangers are henceforth to be admitted without any payment into the south transept, the nave, and the north transept, that is, into the great body of the church. The only part from which they will be excluded, is from the choir (except at times of service), for obvious reasons, and the chapels behind the choir. These will be shown to them at a charge of 6*d.* a piece. This will be the only payment allowed in the Abbey. Such a payment is universal on the Continent."

He sincerely hoped that that would be an inducement to the deans and chapters of other cathedrals to do the same; and he trusted, that the hon. Gentleman would not raise any difficulty by proposing a Resolution on the part of the House of Commons, which they would have great difficulty in enforcing, imposing an obligation on parties who, he believed, were willing to allow as free admission as they could, consistently with due security to works of art.

Mr. Cowper said, the statement of the right hon. Baronet must be gratifying to the House. The reduction of the charge of admission to the Abbey had only tended to render the edifice more of a show-place than it was before. When the charge of admission was high, persons were allowed to walk in and go where they chose; but when a reduction was made, the persons admitted were assembled to the number of twelve, and they then went round, accompanied by a showman, who, in the vulgar manner adopted by exhibitors of waxworks, described the interesting monuments and relics in the building. He strongly objected to a church being converted into a place of exhibition; and he might remind the House that the Abbey was not erected with the object of enabling the dean and chapter to levy a tax upon the public. He thought the public might be admitted into the chapels gratuitously, if they were accompanied by a person whose duty it should be to take care that no injury was done to the monuments or to the edifice. He hoped that the concession announced by the right hon. Baronet was only the prelude to a still further concession, which would afford the public admission to all religious edifices without payment of any pecuniary fee.

Mr. Williams wished the right hon. Baronet had compelled the deans and chapters of Westminster and St. Paul's to give the public free admission to those edifices, for he would thereby have removed the stain upon the character of the clergy which attached to them under the present system of requiring fees. He believed the clergy of the Established Church were the only body in this country who demanded fees for the exhibition of their religious edifices. The cathedrals were public property, and did not belong exclusively to the clergy, who derived large revenues from their exhibition. He hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Hume) would not relax in his laudable efforts to obtain admission for the public to all cathedrals without the payment of any fee.

Mr. Borthwick expressed his gratification at the statement which had just been made by the right hon. Baronet; but he thought the object hon. Gentlemen opposite were anxious to attain would be more effectually secured by the spontaneous good feeling of the clergy, than by any Resolution of the House. His opinion was, that the public ought to have access gratuitously to St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey.

Mr. Hume said, he had heard the statement of the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) with great satisfaction. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would exert his influence to have all other cathedrals, as well as Westminster Abbey, thrown open to the public. He thought the proposed charge of 6*d.* for admission to the chapels in Westminster Abbey, ought to be reduced to half that amount. Under the circumstances, he would not press his Motion.—Motion withdrawn.

South-Eastern Railway — Mr. Wray.] Mr. Hawes, in rising to bring forward the Motion of which he had given notice, could assure the House that it was not without considerable pain that he felt it necessary to call their attention to a portion of the Report of the Committee on the petition of the South-Eastern Railway Company. He had hoped that Her Majesty's Ministers would have spared him the trouble of making, and the House the pain of listening to, the statement of facts to which he now felt it his duty to call their attention. He knew little or nothing of the gentleman whose conduct he was about to bring under their notice. He had no personal feeling whatever towards that gentleman, and he was not aware that, except in his capacity as a public officer, he had ever spoken to him. But, after the notice which the conduct of Mr. Wray had received from the right hon. Home Secretary, he considered it his imperative duty to ask the House and the country to decide whether the strong disapprobation the right hon. Baronet stated he had expressed with regard to Mr. Wray's conduct was a sufficient punishment for the offence that gentleman had committed. It might be said this was a late period of the Session for bringing forward a question of this nature; but he must remind the House that the Report of the Committee to which he had referred was not laid on the Table until the 12th of July. The matter was then left entirely in the hands of the Government; but it was not till the 19th of July that the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) addressed a letter to Mr. Wray—that being the same day on which he (Mr. Hawes) had written to the First Lord of the Treasury (Sir R. Peel), intimating his intention to bring the Report under the notice of the House. The letter of the right hon. Home Secretary to Mr. Wray was not printed till the 22d of July, and he thought the House would admit that it was next to impossible for him to have brought this subject under their consideration at an earlier period. He (Mr. Hawes) wished also, before he took such a step, to obtain the sanction of others to whose judgment he greatly deferred; and this circumstance had alone prevented him from instantly calling the attention of the House to the Report. Now, what had been the conduct of Mr. Wray? The Committee, he might observe, were unanimous in their Report; they agreed upon all the material facts. Mr. Wray was a public officer, holding an appointment of considerable trust and responsibility, and very large sums of public money passed through his hands. It appeared that in 1836, Mr. Wray allowed himself to be retained as the paid agent of a private company to promote the success of a Bill introduced on their behalf, into Parliament. Mr. Wray stated that his engagement was of a strictly professional character. That engagement, it appeared, consisted in canvassing Members of Parliament, and subsequently in paying 300*l.* to a Member of Parliament for the services he had rendered to the Company, he having been a Member of the Select Committee, and having voted upon that Committee. He (Mr. Hawes) had not spoken to any Member of the profession on this subject who had not expressed regret at Mr. Wray's conduct, who had not strongly condemned it, and who had not entirely disclaimed the idea of considering such services in the light of professional services. He (Mr. Hawes) understood that the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) had given Mr. Wray a general permission to exercise his profession while he held the office of Receiver General. He (Mr. Hawes) considered, that in this case Mr. Wray had not acted in the exercise of his profession, but that he had abused the privilege granted to him by the right hon. Baronet. Here was a paid officer who, instead of devoting his attention to his public duties, became the paid agent of a private company, and through whose hands a bribe was conveyed to a Member of that House. What was the opinion expressed by the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) upon such conduct as this? He thought the House would be surprised to find that the right hon. Baronet had taken no notice whatever of this circumstance. In the letter which in that House the right hon. Baronet had said was strongly condemnatory of Mr. Wray's conduct, there was not even a passing allusion to this very remarkable circumstance. There was no fact in this case which might not be found in the shape of admission in Mr. Wray's own evidence. It might be important to ascertain what course the House had taken in cases somewhat similar to this; and it was for them to consider whether, in accordance with former precedents, they could consistently pass in this slight manner over conduct which directly involved a breach of the privileges of the House. It was known to many hon. Members that in 1695 very serious abuses were brought under the notice of the public. At that period Members of Parliament and persons in very high stations were implicated in a system of jobbing somewhat similar to that which had been exposed. The House then came to this general Resolution—

"That the offer of money or any other advantage to any Member of Parliament as a fee or reward for him to promote the furtherance of any matter depending, or to be transacted in Parliament, is a high crime and misdemeanor, and tends to the subversion of the English Constitution."

There could be no doubt that all lawyers would construe such a Resolution to comprehend rewards given afterwards as well as bribes given before the Act done. It was also well known that at common law it was a misdemeanor to offer any reward to any public servant for doing that which he was bound to do without any reward. But the matter which he now sought to bring under the consideration of the House was not one altogether new. He would read a short extract to them, showing what had been done in the case of Mr. Bird :—

"Mr. Bird attended according to order, and was called in, and being at the bar was told by the Speaker that there had been a complaint made against him to this House for offering money to Mr. Musgrove, a Member of this House, to present a petition to this House. Whereunto he said, that some persons did apprehend that a Bill depending in this House for selling an estate, late of Mr. Howland, did affect their interest in part of that estate, and therefore desired him to prepare a petition to be presented to this House for the providing for their interest, which accordingly he did; and that he being a stranger to the proceedings of this House, and there being a title in the case, and knowing Mr. Musgrove to be a gentleman of the long robe, did intend to give him a guinea for his advice in that matter; but understanding by Mr. Musgrove that he had committed an error in so doing, he begged pardon of Mr. Musgrove, and as he did now of this House, and then withdrew. Resolved, that the said Mr. Bird be called in, and that Mr. Speaker do reprimand him upon his knees at the bar. And he was called in, and upon his knees reprimanded accordingly, and then discharged."

He called their attention to this matter for the purpose of showing them how affairs of this kind were dealt with in former times; and he might now add, that there was nothing worse in former times than were the transactions of the present day. He had shown what the House of Commons had done with men high in office —men of rank and station, and at the time of the South Sea bubble he found that the following Resolution had been adopted :—

"That the taking in or holding of stock by the South Sea Company for the benefit of any Member of either House of Parliament, or person concerned in the Administration (during the time that the Company's proposals, or the Bill thereto relating, were depending in Parliament), without any valuable consideration paid, or sufficient security given for the acceptance of or the payment for such stock, and the Company's paying or allowing such person the difference arising by the advanced price of the stock, were corrupt, infamous, and dangerous practices, and highly reflecting on the honour and justice of Parliament, and destructive of the interest of His Majesty's Government."

The case now before the House was one in which an attempt had been made to influence the conduct of Members of the House of Commons, by the application of money belonging to a public company. Then, he would ask, was the House of Commons in the present day to pass over such a case? Would they be satisfied with the weak and undecided letter which the right hon. Baronet had written? It was now time to make a stand against such proceedings, and to call upon the Ministers of the Crown to maintain the purity of the subordinate departments of the Government. He had already referred them to what had been done in the House of Commons, and he had no doubt that the proceedings of the House of Lords would be found to be in consonance with those of the representative branch of the Legislature. In fact, the Journals of the Lords showed this, as might be seen from the following Resolution :—

"It is resolved by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, that the taking of stock belonging to the South Sea Company, or giving credit for the same without a valuable consideration actually paid or sufficiently secured, or the purchasing stock by any director or agent of the South Sea Company for the use or benefit of any person in the Administration, or any Member of either House of Parliament, during such time as the late Bill relating to the South Sea Company was depending last year in Parliament, was a notorious and most dangerous corruption."

Though this was a matter of great importance in the House of Commons, as well as out of doors, yet he refrained from the use of any harsh expression; and he might add, that throughout the whole proceedings of the Committee, there was nothing even approaching to harshness. He was bound further to state, that Mr. Bonham concealed nothing — that he frankly told all he knew—and that the Committee acquitted Captain Boldero of all personal corruption, though his conduct was most indiscreet. But, at the same time, the Committee were quite of opinion that that Gentleman would not, if the Solicitor to the Ordnance had been a man of a different character, have allowed himself to be entangled in such transactions. For Mr. Wray, however, there was no excuse. He took the money in question to Mr. Bonham, that gentleman being at the time under great obligations to him. He did not say that by way of any disparagement to Mr. Bonham, but for the purpose of showing that Mr. Wray ought to have been the last man in the world to solicit him to become concerned in such affairs. Nothing could be so indefensible as was the conduct of Mr. Wray. In bringing these proceedings under the consideration of the House, he stood forward in the discharge of a painful duty. If he had not undertaken that duty, the parties still could not have escaped the just censure of the House, for some other Member would have been induced to call on them to pronounce an opinion. In taking this step, he was sanctioned by the judgment and opinions of several hon. Members, and he felt that it now remained for him to take the sense of the House on the following Resolutions:—

"That it appears from the Report and Evidence laid before this House by the Select Committee on the South Eastern Railway Company's Petition, that Mr. Wray, the Receiver of the Metropolitan Police District, was, in the year 1836, the retained and paid agent of a private Company, to promote the success of a Bill introduced into Parliament on their behalf. That it also appears, from an Answer to an Address of this House, that the Secretary of State for the Home Department has, in consequence of the Report and Evidence referred to, addressed a letter to Mr. Wray, expressing his strong disapprobation of Mr. Wray's conduct. That it appears to this House, upon a reference to the Evidence, that Mr. Wray, on behalf of the South Eastern Railway Company, paid the sum of 300*l.*, derived from the sale of Railway Shares, to Mr. Bonham, for his services as a Member of this House, and as a Member of a Select Committee, to which the Bill of this Company was referred; a circumstance to which the Secretary of State has not adverted in the letter addressed to Mr. Wray. That in the opinion of this House, such conduct deserves not only the serious animadversion of the House, but disqualifies Mr. Wray from holding an office of trust and responsibility under the Crown."

Sir J. Graham said: As the hon. Member for Lambeth has so frankly and unreservedly stated the opinion which he entertains of my conduct, I must say, that I do not blame the course which he has thought proper to take upon this occasion. It appears to me that the question now before the House may be disposed of with very little loss of time, for the whole of the circumstances of the case lie within a very narrow compass. But, before I proceed to consider those facts, or to call the attention of the House to the conclusions which must necessarily be deduced from them, I beg to say that I am not at all about to dispute the constitutional doctrines which the hon. Gentleman has laid down. I have no intention whatever of denying the weight of those precedents to which he has referred us. I quite concur with him in thinking that no care is ill bestowed which has a tendency to preserve the purity of this House; and I also agree with him that it is exposed to some danger from the spirit of speculation which at this moment prevails; and furthermore, no man can, for a moment, doubt that strict impartiality ought to be religiously observed by the Members of this House in every matter, public or private, upon which they are required to give a vote. It is also equally unquestionable that no crime is greater than to attempt to seduce the Members of this House from the strict and uniform observance of that impartiality which forms one of their first duties. After expressing these several opinions, I now proceed to the other observations which I feel called upon to make. In the first place, I must observe that I have not risen for the purpose of defending Mr. Wray; nor is it my intention in any respect to palliate his conduct, and, therefore, all that I have now to say may be very briefly brought before the House. To the best of my judgment, I have in this case endeavoured to do justice, and to give effect to that which I conceived to be the decision of the Committee. The hon. Member who brought forward this Motion has told the House that he had no acquaintance with Mr. Wray, nor any knowledge of him previous to the investigations which took place before the Committee. Now, it so happens that, notwithstanding I have been in office during a period of four years, I never yet came into personal contact with Mr. Wray. He is to me a perfect stranger; I therefore cannot have been influenced towards him by any favourable feeling. I can most truly state that until I wrote the letter which has been brought under the notice of the House, I never had any intercourse with Mr. Wray, nor have I ever received any application on his behalf from any friend of his, nor have I been solicited with reference to him in any form whatever. When I wrote to him, therefore, I felt myself perfectly free to take a dispassionate view of his case. The hon. Gentleman has expressed strong regret that he should have been under the necessity of bringing forward the Motion upon which the House now finds it necessary to decide. I confess I feel some surprise that, as he did consider it his duty to make this Motion, he should have thought proper to make it at so late a period of the Session. I must say I think it very unfortunate that these Resolutions were not proposed ten days ago. Looking round me, I do not at present see any Members of that Committee, excepting the hon. Gentleman, who presided over its deliberations, and one other Member. [Mr. Hawes: There are three Members of the Committee present.] Well, admitting that there are three present, three out of fifteen is a very small minority. But, setting aside questions so comparatively unimportant, I proceed to call the attention of the House to this—that the matter really at issue is, have I or have I not fulfilled the recommendations of the Committee? Now, for that purpose, I repeat that I used my best endeavours. I think I have been fortunate enough to render those endeavours successful; but before I enter into the discussion of that point, there are two or three circumstances to which I wish to advert, and it appears to me that those circumstances ought not to be lost sight of. The hon. Member for Lambeth says that Mr. Wray bribed a Member of this House, and by the bribe which he gave him purchased his co-operation. What is the fact? It was distinctly shown in evidence before the Committee, that the part taken by Mr. Bonham was taken without any reward or promise whatever; and the opinion of the Committee to that effect is set forth in the Report as clearly as it is possible to make any kind of statement. But, then, it is asserted, that the alleged offer made to Mr. Bonham was made at the suggestion of Mr. Wray. The witness Sewell said it was made principally at his suggestion—that is, at the suggestion of Mr. Wray. Now, I fearlessly state, that in this matter I can have no favourable feeling towards Mr. Wray, for he is unknown to me—while, on the contrary, I have long been acquainted with Mr. Bonham, and I am proud to call that gentleman my friend. He has committed a very grave error, and Mr. Bonham never dissembled the extent of that error. I regret that he should have been betrayed into it, but he still is my friend, and I shall continue to call him my Friend; but, though Mr. Wray is not even known to me, I still am bound to do him justice. From the evidence, or at least from a part of it, it would appear that Mr. Wray had some peculiar and personal objects in making the offers which were said to have been made to Mr. Bonham—that, in fact, he was a creditor of Mr. Bonham, and expected to receive the amount of his debt out of the proceeds of such advantages as were expected to accrue from these railway transactions. But these assertions have been altogether disproved. Nothing can be more clear than that Mr. Wray did not touch a single farthing of the money which came into Mr. Bonham's possession. My prejudices, as I have already said, are against Mr. Wray, and in favour of Mr. Bonham, and I wrote to Mr. Wray under the influence of those impressions. Mr. Wray, when he came before the Committee, was told to bring his private account which he had at Drummonds'; but the Committee did not examine that account. And Mr. Elgood was also in attendance, but he was not called in by the Committee. From Mr. Wray's account at Drummonds', it was clear enough that neither directly nor indirectly did he derive any benefit from these railway transactions. To say thus much, is due in common justice to Mr. Wray. The hon. Member for Lambeth says, that I have not referred to the payments made to Mr. Bonham by Mr. Wray; but these were payments made long anterior to the period into which it was the duty of the Committee to inquire. That which I wished to do was, to notify to Mr. Wray my strong disapprobation of the course pursued, and I did notify my disapprobation of the whole transaction. My wish, as I have already said, was to give effect to the Report of the Committee, and I think it important that any hon. Member should notify wherein I failed to give effect to that Report; and I think I have succeeded in causing such measures to be taken as should meet the exigencies and equity of the case. With respect to Mr. Hignett, I can of course have no hesitation in saying that his conduct was proved to have been such that it became necessary he should be removed from the place he held in connexion with the Board of Ordnance. As to the conduct, however, of Mr. Bonham and Captain Boldero, it was shown that their conduct was not so culpable as that of Mr. Hignett; but yet it was the opinion of the Committee that they should withdraw from the service of the Crown, and that their conduct was inconsistent with the strict impartiality which should characterize officers of Government Departments and Members of this House. So soon as Mr. Bonham and Captain Boldero learned the decision of the Committee, they tendered the resignation of their offices, and those resignations were accepted. At page 13 of the Report the Committee say—

"Your Committee cannot conclude without calling the attention of the House to the evidence given by Mr. Wray, the Receiver General of Police."

That evidence is fully set forth in the Report, and nothing can be more clear than this, that no payment was made to Mr. Bonham. I am called on to give my opinion as to the punishment that ought to be inflicted on Mr. Wray. I find that immediately after the passage I have just quoted, the Committee gave it as their opinion that the conduct of Mr. Wray called for very severe animadversion. Looking, then, at the Report of the Committee, and at the fact upon which it is founded, I still hesitated before I made up my mind on this question, whether or not I should dismiss Mr. Wray; and before I finally decided I inquired of more than one Member of the Committee—since it was not a private Committee—as to what occurred with respect to the part Mr. Wray took in the transaction. I was told that the part of the Report, as originally framed by the Chairman, did not stop at the words "serious animadversion;" but that there was added to that expression a sentence, to the effect that "the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department ought seriously to be called to the conduct of Mr. Wray." I was, Sir, assured that these last words were, after a discussion in the Committee, deliberately withdrawn, and that there was no division upon them. That circumstance, when it came to my knowledge, did most materially influence my conduct in the steps which I took with respect to Mr. Wray. If the words originally contained in the Report had been retained there when it was presented to this House, I should have thought that the Committee deemed it necessary for me to adopt some extremely stringent measures with respect to Mr. Wray, and I should have acted accordingly. [Mr. Hawes: The right hon. Gentleman has not told all that passed with regard to Mr. Wray.] I am quite sure that I am stating correctly the facts that were narrated to me by the noble person who formed one of the Committee; and the observation of the hon. Member confirms me in the opinion which I have already expressed as to the disadvantages of discussing a question like the present in the absence of those hon. Members who were on the Committee, and who would be able, if present, to state the facts better than I can do. The real question which is before the House is, whether in fulfilling the functions of the high and responsible office which I have the honour to hold, I have acted fairly and with strict regard to justice and impartiality? I contend, therefore, that I have a right to enter into a consideration of what took place in the Committee; and I do assert that the knowledge on my part of the fact that the words which I have repeated were proposed to be inserted in the Report and were deliberately left out, did most materially and justly weigh with me in writing the letter which it became my duty to address to the individual whose conduct was referred to in that part of the Report. All the individuals implicated in these transactions, have, in so far as Her Majesty's Government had it in their power, been punished. Mr. Hignett was dismissed from his situation as Solicitor to the Board of Ordnance. Two others, one a Member of this House, and the other a Member of the Government, offered their resignations under the most painful circumstances. Mr. Wray, whose position is inferior to that of the gentlemen in question, has been severely censured by me; and I must now say, that, on the whole, though I may be held to have been wrong in what I did, I should under the same circumstances, do the same again that I have done; and I say that every dispassionate man, on reading the Report of the Committee, would come to the same conclusion that I have done with respect to the precise amount of blame which is attached in the words of the Report itself to the conduct of each of the individuals implicated in the transactions inquired into. It will, therefore, be for the House to determine the question upon the grounds which I have now laid before it.

Mr. Hawes, in explanation, would state to the House the facts relative to the alteration of the Report, without making any comment. The original draught of the Report, as framed by himself in his capacity of Chairman of the Select Committee, said, with reference to Mr. Wray, that "such conduct deserved the immediate notice of the Secretary of State for the Home Department." Some objection was taken by a Member of the Committee to the introduction of the mention of the Secretary of State in the Report. It was urged that the duty confided to the Committee was to examine into the matters referred to them, and to report the facts to the House; and it was then proposed that, in lieu of drawing the attention of the Home Secretary to the conduct of Mr. Wray, the words "serious animadversion" should be substituted. He confessed that he was of opinion at the time that this expression was far more severe than that which he had originally proposed, but at the same time he did not think it was more severe than the circumstances called for.

Mr. Sheil said, that the statement of the right hon. Baronet was, that he had given to the composition of the letter to Mr. Wray the utmost care and attention —weighing, in fact, every expression employed in it. He admitted that he had sent for a noble Lord a Member of the Committee—Lord Ashley, he presumed— [Sir J. Graham: I did not say so.] No, but he was justified in assuming that it was the noble Lord, as the right hon. Gentleman had been in communication with a noble Lord a Member of the Committee, and Lord Ashley was the only noble Lord to whom the description could apply. He could not help, however, thinking it rather extraordinary that the right hon. Gentleman should not have consulted the chairman of the Committee as to a fact in which the chairman was principally concerned. The draft of the Report was furnished by the chairman in the performance of his official functions as head of the Committee. Certain alterations were made in it: but would it not have been the regular course, in inquiring into these alterations, to have sent for the individual with whom the Report had originated? The right hon. Baronet stated, that he had not written this letter in a careless, hasty mood, but that, on the contrary, he had well weighed its every expression—every phrase. Now, that being the case, it was curious that he should have omitted from the letter to Mr. Wray all mention of the principal charge brought against him. The Report of the Committee made a distinct specification of that particular charge. Let the House listen to the concluding paragraph of that part of the Report which referred to Mr. Wray:—

"Your Committee feel the greatest regret in being obliged to direct the attention of the House to a circumstance which has been disclosed in the course of this investigation, viz., that Mr. Bonham received from the South Eastern Railway Company in the year 1836, at which time he was a Member of the House of Commons, the sum of 300*l.* This sum appears to have arisen from the premium upon the sale of 100 reserved shares, which were, subsequently to the passing of the Bill, appropriated to Mr. Bonham, and disposed of for his benefit, and was paid by a check to Mr. Bonham, through Mr. Wray, as a gratuity for the services which he had rendered to that Company, both in and out of Parliament, and as a Member of the Committee on the South Eastern Railway Company's Bill. But the Committee are bound, in justice to Mr. Bonham, to add, that they received no evidence to show that such gratuity was the result of any previous arrangement between Mr. Bonham and the Company."

Here then (said the right hon. and learned Gentleman) is a fact—a most material fact —selected by the Committee, dwelt on by the Committee with more distinctness, and in a spirit of more specific reprehension than any other, and one in reference to which, as the immediate antecedent (you will excuse the legal expression), the Committee reported they could not abstain from saying that "the conduct of Mr. Wray was deserving of serious animadversion." It is to that—what shall I call it?—most unfortunate transaction, in which Mr. Wray and Mr. Bonham were both implicated, and with respect to which, if Mr. Bonham is criminal at all, Mr. Wray is far more culpable, that the Committee directed the special attention of the House. And yet that is the very fact which the right hon. Gentleman, I will not say studiously omitted, but which, after mature deliberation, he neglected to notice. I turn from one part of the conduct of Mr. Wray noticed by the Committee, to the other reprehended in the letter of the right hon. Gentleman, and which really was not a serious charge—that this Gentleman was the paid agent of a Company at the same time that he was a paid officer of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman says:—

"I have learnt with regret from this Report, that you were, in the year 1836, while holding a responsible office under Government, retained as a paid agent of a private Company to promote the success of a Bill introduced into Parliament on their behalf; and that you were engaged to canvass Members of the House of Commons in favour of that measure during its progress through Parliament."

[Sir James Graham: Read on.] The right hon. Gentleman continues:—

"It now becomes my duty to convey to you my strong disapprobation of the course which you thus pursued. I do not think it necessary, on the present occasion, to express any opinion whether the due performance of the duties of Receiver General of Police might or might not have been, in the first instance, compatible with private practice as a barrister; but I can entertain no doubt that your interference, especially as a paid agent in canvassing Members, must tend to weaken the confidence of the public in the impartiality of the Government, whose officer you are, and materially to impair your efficiency in the performance of the official duties which are entrusted to you."

Now, I must say, with reference to this part of the reprimand of the right hon. Gentleman, that to canvass Members of Parliament in that lobby is one thing, and to apply to an individual Member of a Select Committee to use his influence to pass the Bill which was referred to that body—to solicit his sustainment of a measure, in reference to which he stood in a fiduciary and, I may say, judicial capacity—is quite a different thing. Now, hear the statement made by Mr. Bonham, whom the Committee reported to have regularly attended and voted on the Committee of the South Eastern Railway Bill:—

"In the early part of the Session of 1836, Mr. Wray, to whom I was under considerable obligations (it is not necessary to state them with explicitness), came to me and said, 'I am very much interested in the success of the South Eastern Railway, and I wish you would give us a lift; and I want your advice upon some points.' I said, 'My dear Wray, I owe very great obligations to you, and I will do anything I can to serve you.' He said, 'I should be very much obliged to you if you would.' And upon that, I have not the least hesitation in stating that I did all I could individually to assist Mr. Wray in the object he had in view; that is, in plain terms, I did what I could to assist him in passing that Bill, both in and out of Parliament. Mr. Wray never held out to me one word, nor did any conversation ever take place, as to any advantage of any kind or sort that I was to derive from it. I considered it a great personal advantage; I mean personal, with reference to the debt of gratitude that I owed him."

Now, I think, it will be admitted that Mr. Wray, being the creditor of Mr. Bonham, and having the power of dictating, as has been said by a high authority, "in all the obsequious forms of peremptory submission," his application on the Bill referred to was something very different from what we understand as the canvass of Members of Parliament. [Sir James Graham: Read on.] I shall read that part to which the right hon. Gentleman seems to refer:—

"I can only state again that, as to the transaction itself, there was never, at the time I assisted them, the smallest expectation on my mind of deriving any advantage from it; and of course, when I state this, the Committee will most naturally and properly take care to ascertain that fact from other quarters."

Now, I will say more. I have read the evidence carefully, and I have not found an insinuation, even in the shape of an intelligible inuendo, that any arrangement was previously entered into with Mr. Bonham that he should vote in a particular way. That the communication was understood by Mr. Bonham to be in the shape of a bribe, is what by no circumlocution, or by the most malignant paraphrase, can be inferred; but what the meaning of Mr. Wray's offers were, can be best interpreted by his own evidence. Here it is:—

"CHAIRMAN: Were you not appointed to confer with Mr. Bonham upon the matter?—An offer of 100 shares was made through me to Mr. Bonham.

When did you make the offer to Mr. Bonham?—Subsequently to the passing of the Bill.

How?—I do not know. I am very intimate with Mr. Bonham; I very likely told him.

What did you tell him it was offered for?—I told him they wished to show some mark of gratitude for his favours, and that 100 shares were therefore placed at his disposal.

Mr. ROEBUCK: For the services he had rendered to the Bill?—Yes.

In what capacity?—For the general support he had given to the Bill.

In the House of Commons?—He was in the House of Commons, I think.

CHAIRMAN: You do not doubt that he was in the House of Commons?—I think he was.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Could he have rendered assistance in any other way?—I do not think he could, except by canvassing parties out of doors. There were several Members of Parliament who were equally active, I think, with him.

Did they receive any money?—I do not know; I am not in the least aware.

But he was an active Member of Parliament, and paid for his activity?—He was an active Member of Parliament, and paid in that way, you may take it.

CHAIRMAN: But you have no doubt of the fact that 300*l.* was awarded to Mr. Bonham, and he received it?—None.

Mr. ROEBUCK: For his services as a Member of Parliament?—The Committee must draw its own inference; I can only say that they felt very grateful to him for his services both in and out of doors."

Now, under these circumstances, can the House be of opinion that the letter addressed to Mr. Wray by the right hon. Gentleman, within whose cognizance this matter specially fell, was of the character it ought to be? The Committee, composed of men of high rank and station in this House—men of all parties, the majority being of the right hon. Gentleman's own party, and there not being a single division, were unanimous that Mr. Wray deserved serious reprehension. For what? For that which the right hon. Gentleman entirely omitted in his reprimand. The charge I bring against the right hon. Gentleman is, that "canvassing Members of Parliament" did not include the specific accusation brought against Mr. Wray, and in that respect the right hon. Gentleman was himself in fault; for—

"Judex damnatur cum nocens absolvitur."

The right hon. Gentleman says he is himself implicated in this case; and of a sin of omisson I think he has proved himself guilty.

Mr. W. Patten said, that it was impossible to pursue a discussion like the present without inflicting a very serious degree of pain upon many individuals; and if that was the object in view, he should have supposed that the suffering occasioned by the former discussion had been sufficiently severe. He should therefore abstain from entering upon any topic other than that immediately under consideration, namely, the construction to be put upon the Report. He must, however, be permitted to observe, that as the right hon. Baronet had referred in handsome terms to Mr. Bonham, whose friendship he had not hesitated to claim, so he (Mr. W. Patten) must say with reference to Captain Boldero, that he was guiltless of everything, except indiscretion, in the transactions reported upon; and he fearlessly asserted that his friend Captain Boldero was entirely innocent in the matter. Not one of the Committee had said a word which could affect the honour of Captain Boldero; and he regretted very much, though the circumstance was highly to his credit, that he should have felt called upon to resign his office. The hon. Member for Lambeth had alluded to the unanimity which prevailed in the Committee. Looking to the particular circumstances brought under discussion by him, he thought the hon. Member would have acted somewhat more fairly if he had referred to the Members of the Committee, and have asked their opinions before he brought his Motion before the House. He was bound to express his conviction, that if the Committee had to make their Report over again, they would not convey their opinion in the language stated by the hon. Member. He had taken notes of what had occurred in the Committee, and from their perusal, aided by his own recollection, he must certainly state that the words "serious animadversion" were not intended by the Committee to lead to the course against Mr. Wray recommended to be adopted by the hon. Member for Lambeth. Several circumstances concurred in leading the Committee to adopt a lenient and moderate course—amongst those circumstances the lapse of time since the transactions occurred, and the imperfect recollection of the transactions by Mr. Wray. He must, therefore, repeat his observation that he could have wished the hon. Member had taken the opinion of the Committee before he adopted his present course. He must say, that the right hon. Baronet had correctly judged of the Report. If he had not done so, he (Mr. W. Patten) must state, that he himself ought to be held responsible for not having more accurately and precisely expressed his meaning when he agreed to the expressions referring to Mr. Wray. The right hon. Baronet had no power to act beyond that line which the Committee had distinctly marked out for him, for the Committee itself selected the evidence upon which Mr. Wray's culpability rested. Then it proceeded to say, having given that summary of the evidence, "Your Committee cannot abstain from expressing their opinion, that the part taken by Mr. Wray is deserving of serious animadversion." Now, he (Mr. W. Patten) was bound to say, if the right hon. Baronet had actually dismissed Mr. Wray, considering that Mr. Wray was his own accuser, and looking at all the circumstances of the case—though he would not say that it would not have been just—that he should have regarded it as a rigid measure of justice; and he did think that the right hon. Baronet, in taking a lenient course, had erred, if he had erred at all, upon the right side. He had a strong opinion upon the criminality of the practice imputed to Mr. Wray; and he agreed, that at the present moment every exertion should be made by that House to check its progress. He was unwilling, however, that the House should come to a decision upon this point when so few of the Committee were present; but he felt, also, that he should be acting in a more severe manner than the case justified if he should accede to the Motion of the hon. Member for Lambeth; he hoped, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman would not feel aggrieved if he (Mr. W. Patten) should move the previous question. The question was one of the most painful in which he had ever been engaged, since he had been a Member of that House. He did not know Mr. Wray—he had never seen him till he entered the Committee room, nor had he seen him since—but he must say, that if Mr. Wray possessed the common feelings of humanity, a much severer punishment than that which had been inflicted upon him by the right hon. Baronet, could not by possibility have been passed. He should, therefore, move as an Amendment the previous question.

Lord J. Russell said: Sir, the question now before the House is, whether the House shall think proper to take any notice of a transaction with respect to which a Committee has laid a Report before the House; or whether the House shall entirely pass it by? The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and who moved the previous question, says, that this is a painful subject. No doubt it is a painful subject, as all accusations involving the character of individuals must be; but the question really for the House to consider, is, whether, because it is a painful subject, they can altogether avoid expressing any opinion upon it, and whether it is not due to the character of the House and to public justice that some Resolution of this kind should be passed? There is no doubt that every case of a Resolution of censure—that every case of impeachment, especially, which is brought before this House, imposes on it a painful duty; but if it is a question on which the House is bound to express an opinion, its being a painful duty is no reason whatever why we should endeavour to evade it, and to shrink from the performance of that which the Constitution has made it incumbent on us to perform. The right hon. Gentleman has stated, that it is very unfortunate that my hon. Friend should have brought forward this Motion so late in the Session. I own, I hardly expected that that would be brought as a reproach against my hon. Friend. As soon as I perceived that a Report was coming into this House, I asked my hon. Friend, if he were not going to take some notice of it? He replied, that he thought it right to wait a week, that you might have full time to deliberate and to decide upon the course which you might think right? I thought that my hon. Friend took a just and proper determination—it was a determination of forbearance towards the Executive Government, and I thought he acted rightly. But it is now made a reproach to my hon. Friend. ["No, no."] It is now, I say, made a reproach to my hon. Friend, that he did not ten days ago, bring forward this Motion. That is the charge which the right hon. Gentleman thinks it decent to bring against my hon. Friend. Why, it was necessary, as my hon. Friend had waited so long, that he should then ascertain from the Ministers of the Crown what course they had adopted; and when the right hon. Gentleman said, that he had contented himself with writing a letter of reprimand to Mr. Wray, it was proper that he should see that letter, and should consider what it was incumbent on him then to do under the circumstances; so that delay could hardly be avoided, consistently, in the first place, with the forbearance due to the Executive Government, and in the next place, to the justice of the case. But then the right hon. Gentleman says, that he has considered the case with the view of adopting the recommendations of the Committee. That is the whole case of the right hon. Gentleman, and that, as I think, involves a mistake in judgment which he committed. When I say a mistake in judgment, I am not accusing him of any particular partiality to Mr. Wray. I do not say, that Mr. Wray is a friend or political partisan of the right hon. Baronet; I am not making any accusation of that kind; but the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to say, that I think he committed an error in judgment, in his place as a Minister of the Crown, in the course which he adopted. It does not appear to me that the Committee had any business to apportion the punishment which might be due for the several faults or offences which they might find to have been committed; that, I think, was no part of the duty of the Committee. I cannot find, with regard to more serious offences, that Committees of this House have ever thought it to be their duty to apportion the amount of punishment which ought to be inflicted. I was referring to a case of a much graver nature than this, viz. that of Sir Jonah Barrington, who was removed from his office in consequence of an Address of this House. I find that the Committee stated all the circumstances — they stated the culpability of Sir J. Barrington in having converted to his own use moneys paid in by certain persons who were before his court; but they never laid down what the penalty should be. Being a Committee carefully and judiciously performing their duty, they thought it no part of their duty to tell the House, or to dictate to the Crown, what should be done. That was the business of the House; and this House and the other House undertook that duty, a painful one no doubt; they addressed the Crown for the removal of Sir J. Barrington, and the Crown complied with that Address. That is the business of the House; and, therefore, I think that the right hon. Gentleman is quite mistaken in saying that he was to look to the Report of the Committee, and to endeavour to gather from their words what was the exact course which he was bound to take with regard to Mr. Wray. I think he was still more in error when he endeavoured to gather from a single Member of the Committee what had passed in the Committee, and what were the general views of the Committee—I think he was wrong to take any such course; but I think, if he had adopted such a step at all, that he should have gone to the Chairman of the Committee. The right hon. Baronet, however, asks the opinion of a single Member; he gathers from him what he thinks to be their opinion; he acts upon that opinion, and it turns out to be totally at variance with the opinion of the Chairman, and, as the Chairman supposes, with that of the Committee itself. That shows that the right hon. Gentleman is in error when he conceived that it was his duty simply to take into his consideration the Report of the Committee. Well, now, Sir, what I have said is for the purpose of showing that I think this was a matter for the House to consider, and not for the Committee. I think that my hon. Friend was justified in bringing it before the House; because I consider that the offence is a very grave one, and that it cannot be passed over by this House without inflicting a serious injury upon the character of the House. What has the right hon. Gentleman done? He has, in the opinion of my hon. Friend, and in my opinion, entirely passed over the offence of offering 300*l.* to a Member of this House for his services in this House, and has only censured Mr. Wray for having undertaken business incompatible with the due performance of his functions. Why, if Mr. Wray had undertaken the common duties of a barrister—if he had pleaded in the Court of Queen's Bench—if he had done anything that would have been commendable in any other person not a public functionary, I think that this reprimand would have been almost as applicable as to the present case. It is as if any office-keeper or messenger in the right hon. Gentleman's office should be distributing bribes to the electors of Westminster at the time of an election, and the right hon. Gentleman should say to him, "I don't think it right that you should continue to distribute those bribes, because it takes up your time, the whole of which you should devote to the Home Office." That is just the sort of reprimand which the right hon. Baronet has given in this case, and therefore I think that it is inadequate. Now as to the kind of offence which has been committed. I have compared it to what I think is the nearest analogy that can be made to it, viz. to the offence of bribing electors who are entitled to vote in the election of a Member to serve in Parliament. It is an offence of a like nature, but of a higher degree. The right hon. Gentleman says, that Mr. Wray never said to Mr. Bonham, "If you take a part actively in our favour in the Committee, and if you promote the South-Eastern Railway Bill in the House, you shall have a particular reward." The right hon. Gentleman was right in that; but how is the offence of bribery defined in the case of voting for Members to serve in Parliament? The Act relative to bribery has a clause with regard to giving head money at elections, and after stating that such a practice prevails, it says—

"Be it declared and enacted, that the payment or gift of any sum of money to any voter before or after any election, or to any person on his behalf, or to any person related to him by birth or affinity, on account of such voter having voted, or refrained from voting, whether paid under the name of head money, or under any name whatsoever, the same shall be deemed to be bribery."

And that is, whether there is any previous understanding or not; there is nothing in the clause with respect to any previous promise—the only question is, whether money is paid to him on account of his having voted, or having refrained from voting, at any election. Then I come to this case; and I ask, is it on account of the votes and of the conduct of Mr. Bonham, as a Member of this House, that 300*l.* was paid to him, derived from shares which had been disposed of by Mr. Wray for the purpose of obtaining that 300*l.*? and I find this in the evidence, after proof is given of the offering of 100 shares to Mr. Bonham by Mr. Wray:—

"What did you tell him it was offered for?—I told him they wished to show some mark of gratitude for his favours, and that 100 shares were therefore placed at his disposal.

"Mr. Roebuck: For the services he had rendered to the Bill?—Yes.

"In what capacity?—For the general support he had given to the Bill.

"In the House of Commons?—He was in the House of Commons, I think.

"Chairman: You do not doubt that he was in the House of Commons?—I think he was.

"Mr. Roebuck: Could he have rendered assistance in any other way?—I do not think he could, except by canvassing parties out of doors. There were several Members of Parliament who were equally active, I think, with him.

"Did they receive any money?—I do not know; I am not in the least aware.

"But he was an active Member of Parliament, and paid for his activity?—He was an active Member of Parliament, and paid in that way, you may take it."

Now, that is the whole case; and that justifies, I think, my hon. Friend in saying that this was a bribe administered by Mr. Wray to a Member of this House for his active services as a Member of this House. That is the case as admitted by Mr. Wray; and this which I have before read is that which you, by an Act of Parliament passed a few years ago, have declared to be bribery at elections. Of this you may be sure, that there is no man who is a handloom weaver, or a cobbler, or a day labourer in agriculture, who, if found receiving money under such circumstances for having given his vote, and brought before a court of law, would not be convicted of bribery, and suffer the penalty due in that behalf. If that be the case—if any man in those circumstances—if any man compelled by his poverty, is tempted by the offer of 5*l.* or 10*l.* to gain a sum by which his wife and family may be supported—if such a man is to be sent to gaol, and to be subject to a heavy penalty—I say it is not justice to allow 300*l.* to be given to a Member of Parliament for his vote, and afterwards to adminster to the person who gave it, only a gentle rebuke for his improper interference in matters which were inconsistent with his business as Receiver General of Police. That is the view which I take of the case; and there are no considerations of the pain it may give to Mr. Wray, or to any other person who has committed this offence, which would induce me to refrain from giving my vote upon this occasion in support of the Motion of my hon. Friend; by which means I believe I shall best meet the justice of the case, and uphold the dignity of this House. The House declares, that it will visit severely the offering of any gratuity to any Member of this House for any part of his Parliamentary conduct. Are you prepared not to act up to that? Do you mean to declare that the Resolutions of 1695, or of the time of the South Sea bubble, were of an age too virtuous for your imitation—that you dare not imitate the times of William III. or George I.—and that in these days we must be more lax in the rules which we apply to Members of Parliament? I trust you will not sanction such an inference as that; and yet you cannot pass this matter by by voting the previous question without inducing that inference, and compelling the public to believe that you do conceive it a small offence, sufficient that it is mentioned with a reprimand, that 300*l.* is given to a Member of Parliament for his vote and influence upon a Private Bill in this House. Then it appears that this happened a long time ago, in 1836. That may be. But in the case of Sir Jonah Barrington, with respect to whom an Address of this House was presented to the Crown to remove him from his judicial office, the greatest punishment that could be inflicted on any one holding the office of Judge, was passed in 1829. The offences were committed in 1805 and 1810, and they were not represented to this House till twenty-four years after; and then that was an offence for which this House, and the House of Lords, without any difference of opinion, without any division, carried up an Address to the Crown, praying that Sir Jonah Barrington might be removed. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman, in the last place, says it will be an attack upon, or a censure upon him, if this Resolution shall be passed. Why, Sir, are we to come to this, that we cannot preserve the purity of this House, if our doing so should in any way reflect on the purity of the Secretary of State? Are we to have it said, "You must not endeavour to protect your Members from the offence of bribery, to remove those who have in any way attempted to bribe—not because the Secretary of State is in any way involved in this corrupt transaction — not because he is in any way connected with the offending party — but because, on reviewing the offence, he came to one opinion, and therefore the House of Commons must not venture to come to another." Are we really sunk so low as this? I dare say many official Gentlemen are here who will be ready to maintain the infallibility of the Secretary of State; but I must raise my voice on behalf of the House of Commons. I must say that the House of Commons, however late it may be in the Session, if the Secretary of State has not shown a good judgment, ought to show a better. I do not think a Secretary of State need be much ashamed if the House of Commons should venture to say, in a matter that concerns themselves, that they have formed a judgment different from his—one formed on juster precedents, and tending more to the purity of Parliament. And I think it hardly fair for the Secretary of State to say to the House of Commons, "Do not come to this Resolution, because, if you do, you will be reflecting on me, I having come, ten days ago, to a different decision; I read the Report. I considered it quite by myself without consulting any body else; mine is therefore to be reckoned an infallible decision, and you are not to deal with it." The right hon. Gentleman says, too, that his decision has been one of lenity. I do not impute to him in this case the being actuated by any other motive than a wish not to deal too harshly with a public servant, placed under his own auspices, but with whom he has no personal connexion. But I do not think the right hon. Gentleman always takes the lenient view. I have known individuals, foreigners in this country, who were exposed to charges that they were suborners of assassination, and the right hon. Gentleman having received those accusations in the month of February, in the one year, brought them forward in the month of April in the next year, having allowed fourteen months to elapse, without inquiring whether there was an answer to those accusations, which should prove them to be untrue, false, and unfounded. I think a right hon. Gentleman who could so have acted, can hardly take credit for his leniency; can hardly take credit for being a person who is ready to spare the feelings of others—can hardly take credit for having acted from no other motive than regard to public concernments. I shall never forget that case; it made a very deep impression upon me; I think it reflected upon the hospitality of this country. But this case is eminently one of justice; I think it a case in which the justice of this House is concerned. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Robert Peel) received the resignations of Mr. Bonham and Captain Boldero. If he thought they had been unjustly treated—that their offence did not merit removal from the public service, he had only to say, I shall not offer your resignations to Her Majesty; I think you are innocent, and it is my duty, therefore, to ask you to continue to hold your offices. He judged otherwise, and I think rightly. I think neither Mr. Bonham nor Captain Boldero ought to have continued to hold their situations in the public service. But with respect to their offences there is a mighty difference. In regard to Mr. Bonham's connexion with Mr. Wray, he is so far guilty, that although he did not expect to receive a pecuniary reward, he did not withstand the temptation of 300*l.* offered by a Company for services performed in this House. Therefore I think the right hon. Gentleman could not do otherwise than tender the resignation of Mr. Bonham to Her Majesty, and advise her to accept it. With respect to Captain Boldero, I think it was a much more doubtful matter. I myself consider that there was no criminality attaching to Captain Boldero, though I consider there was conduct which did not become a person holding an office in a public department which had to give its consent to certain railways with which he chose to be connected. I do not think there is any proof that reflections which might have struck a more discreet person than Captain Boldero, did strike his mind, or that he was aware of the impropriety of his conduct. I think, therefore, it amounted to this—that the right hon. Gentleman was bound to accept his resignation, and did his duty in tendering it to Her Majesty; while I think it was fair that he should, as I dare say he did, express to Her Majesty his very great regret that such should be his public duty towards a man whose personal integrity he had no reason to doubt. But the case of Captain Boldero being what I have just stated, now comes the question whether another person who was concerned much more deeply, and with respect to a much more grave offence, should be allowed to escape only with a letter which he could show merely as a proof that the Secretary of State did not think it altogether proper that he should act as a barrister at the same time that he was Receiver General of Police. Is this fair and equal justice? I do not see any reason why you should act differently in that case from the others. I will even say, if there are men to whom you are disposed to act with partiality, you should be more strict in visiting their misconduct with this penalty, but that should not prevent you from inquiring into the justice of the case before you, and dealing with each as he deserves. This is, in fine, not a question of accusation against the Ministers of the Crown, as the right hon. Gentleman has chosen to put it; it is a question regarding the purity and character of this House, upon which, if the House were to agree with my hon. Friend, they would certainly impugn the justice, while they did not call in question the purity of the motives of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. This, as far as I see, is the whole question, and I shall certainly give my vote in favour of the Motion.

Sir R. Peel: The noble Lord has entirely mistaken the purport and intent of the observations of my right hon. Friend, when he complained of the late period of the Session at which the hon. Gentleman had submitted this question to the consideration of the House. My right hon. Friend, with myself, was disposed to give to the hon. Gentleman all due credit for that forbearance which led him to postpone any question as to the course which her Majesty's Government intended to pursue, until the lapse of that period which should enable them maturely to consider the bearing and effect of the Report agreed to by the Committee. My right hon. Friend said nothing to-night which was meant in the slightest degree to charge the hon. Gentleman with any neglect of duty in that respect. But this was the fact to which the observations of my right hon. Friend had reference, that the letter which my right hon. Friend wrote to Mr. Wray, conveying the decision of the Government to him, was presented to this House on the 22nd of July. If the hon. Gentleman were dissatisfied with the decision to which my right hon. Friend had come, why is it that he postponed calling the attention of the House to the subject until the 4th of August, having been in possession of that letter on the 22nd July? [Mr. Hawes: I gave notice last Thursday.] Yes; but if you were dissatisfied with the course taken by my right hon. Friend, surely it was competent for you, immediately on seeing that letter, and ascertaining the decision of my right hon. Friend—or, at least, it clearly was within two days of the reading of that letter, competent to have given that notice which would have enabled Members of that Committee to have been present at this discussion. The noble Lord adverted to an expression of my right hon. Friend behind me, that this was a painful subject, saying, that, although it was painful to our private feelings, we were not on that account at liberty to shrink from the performance of a public duty. I admit the position of the noble Lord; I think on this, as on many other subjects, no consideration of pain to our private feelings, is sufficient to save us from the performance of a public duty. But is it possible he can believe that any consideration of the kind has prevented Government from dealing out that measure which is consistent with justice? Can he make no allowance for persons in the situation of my right hon. Friend and myself, for the pain it must have caused them to accept of the resignations of Mr. Bonham and Captain Boldero? Have we shown, from a desire to consult our private feelings, or protect our personal friends, any disposition to shrink from the adoption of those measures which might be necessary for the purpose of justice? Having had to perform many painful acts in the course of my public life, I can sincerely say that I never have performed any so painful to my private feelings as the advising Her Majesty to accept the resignation tendered by Captain Boldero. With respect to Mr. Bonham, I have long been connected with him by ties of private friendship; and now, at a time when he is labouring under the affliction inseparable from removal from the public service, I will not hesitate to say that, impossible as it is to defend that act, my feelings towards him remain unaltered. And although not connected with him by the same ties of private friendship, the pain I felt in advising Her Majesty to accept the resignation of Captain Boldero, was equal to that I felt in advising the acceptance of the resignation of Mr. Bonham. And this I will say of Captain Boldero, that I do not believe, in the whole range of the public service, except as to this particular transaction, there is a man who has performed with greater fidelity, industry, and integrity, the duties of his situation; I know all the difficulties of a military man filling such a situation; I know how difficult it is to resist solicitation; but I appeal to my right hon. Friend, whether or no we have not entire confidence that any matter of public business entrusted to Captain Boldero would be transacted by him with no other view, no other intention, than looking in what mode he could best consult the interests of economy; and, at the same time, provide for the public service? In the execution of his duty I never met with an officer whose conduct, up to the period of this particular transaction—and in that it was inadvertence, and not corruption — was more blameless. Why did he tender his resignation? Not from the consciousness of having acted corruptly, not from any belief felt that his official conduct had been influenced in the slightest degree by the possession of those shares; but, in the spirit which I think became a man of honour, seeing the Report of that Committee, and the expressions used respecting his conduct, he felt it better that he should tender his resignation. I have referred to this for the purpose of showing that it is quite possible for me to concur with the noble Lord, that no consideration of personal feeling, no fear of being subjected to pain, should deter us from the performance of a public duty. I think we have shown throughout this transaction, in the acceptance of these resignations, a desire to prevent the influence of personal feelings weighing injuriously, and to protect the honour and credit of the public service. But then the noble Lord says, we are not to be prevented from passing any Resolution, merely because it is to censure my right hon. Friend. Did my right hon. Friend ask any forbearance towards him? Did he claim any exemption from punishment, if it be just? But the question is, whether the course taken by my right hon. Friend subjects him to the implied censure which you will pass upon him if you proceed to this Resolution. That is the whole question, not whether you cannot do it, but whether it be just or not. This is an offence against Parliamentary privileges, rather than an offence against the Crown, committed in the execution of particular duties incumbent on the holder of the office of Receiver General of Police. This House, therefore, took it into its cognizance, and appointed a Committee on which it devolved the duty of expressing an opinion. If you assign to us, then, the duty of inflicting punishment without reference to the Report, you have led us into a snare, because this House is responsible for the acts of the Committee, which it did not disavow. The Committee, having given a summary of the evidence, proceed to state to the House the conclusion to which they have come, both with respect to the charges contained in the petition of the South Eastern Railway Company, and the conduct of the parties implicated in the transaction, as disclosed in the evidence. They did not say, We will rehearse to you the bare facts; and leave it to the Crown to judge of them; but they said, We will now proceed to apprise you of the conclusions to which we have come upon them. They did not content themselves, as in the case of Sir Jonah Barrington, with relating what had been done, but they discriminated between the cases, and apportioned the degree of blame that each was conceived to deserve. With respect to Mr. Hignett, they did not content themselves with saying, "There is his case, and you will observe his conduct has been corrupt." Not at all. They said that—

"Mr. Hignett corruptly used the influence of his official station for the furtherance of his private pecuniary interest, and has therefore shown himself unworthy of confidence as a public man."

Acting on the Report of the Committee, I advised the Master General of the Ordnance immediately to proceed to the dismissal of Mr. Hignett. I said, "Here is the Report of the Committee; they state that they think Mr. Hignett unworthy of confidence as a public officer; at once dismiss him from the public service; that is the report of the tribunal appointed by the House of Commons to inquire into this transaction, and to lay before the House of Commons its sentiments with regard to the conduct of the public officers concerned." You tell us the Committee was appointed of distinguished men, and was unanimous in its opinion, Why, that is precisely the point we took into consideration. My right hon. Friend said, the Committee was unanimous, and above all exception in its own position; I cannot take a better course than to carry out the recommendation of the Committee. With respect to Mr. Bonham and Captain Boldero, they have said that—

"Such transactions are inconsistent with the maintenance of that strict impartiality of conduct upon public questions which is to be expected from the public servants of the Crown, and calculated to impair the confidence of the public in the integrity of Members of Parliament."

My right hon. Friend and myself, therefore, determined to accept the resignation which they tendered. Having shown an utter disregard of our private feelings, and acted so far in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee, we came to the case of Mr. Wray. My right hon. Friend said, "With respect to this matter, which is not one of official conduct that the Crown could notice, but a Parliamentary offence, I wish to carry out the recommendations of the Parliamentary Committee." And what said they with respect to Mr. Wray? "Your Committee cannot abstain from expressing their opinion that the part taken by Mr. Wray, the Receiver General of Police, is deserving of serious animadversion." "Well," said my right hon. Friend, "we have dismissed Mr. Hignett; we have accepted the resignations of our private and political friends, and I will fulfil the recommendations of the Parliamentary Committee, and express my severe disapprobation of the conduct of Mr. Wray." It was for the conduct thus pursued by Mr. Wray, that my right hon. Friend said, "I visit you with my severe reprobation, and unless you confine yourself to the duties of your office, you incur the penalties of dismissal." Just contrast the Motion made with the recommendation of the Committee. I ask, will the House pass an implied censure on my right hon. Friend, for having complied with that recommendation? In your Report, you draw a manifest distinction, sufficient to deceive any Minister of the Crown, between the cases of Hignett and Wray. You do not say of the latter that he has rendered himself unworthy of public confidence, but he has rendered himself liable to severe animadversion. But when you make your Parliamentary Motion, what are your words? "That Mr. Wray's conduct deserves not only the serious animadversion of the House"—that being the recommendation of the Committee—"but disqualifies Mr. Wray from holding an office of trust and responsibility." Would there be any justice in now visiting us with punishment, because we construed the intentions of the Committee from their expressions, and did not subject Mr. Wray to the same punishment as Mr. Hignett? In your Resolution, you assimilate Mr. Wray's case to that of Mr.

Hignett, but you did not do so before. Did you think him equally culpable, or so much so that he ought to be removed from office? Then why did you not say so? If you had said a word as to Mr. Wray being undeserving of confidence as a public officer, my right hon. Friend would have dismissed him at once; but you said nothing of the kind. In the original draught of the Report stood the words—

"To call the attention of the Secretary of State particularly to the conduct of Mr. Wray;"—

But these were omitted afterwards. The hon. Gentleman suggests a doubt as to the difficulty of the House of Commons calling the attention of the Secretary of State to the conduct of Mr. Wray; but you might have avoided all difficulty by simply following the method adopted with respect to the case of Mr. Hignett. My right hon. Friend said that from no human being has he received a solicitation in favour of Mr. Wray, nor was any communication, direct or indirect, made on his behalf. This is important, as showing the animus of my right hon. Friend, and that he had no motive but a wish to do justice. I do not know what such a stoic, with feelings so Spartan as those of the noble Lord might have advised; but you must make allowance for the weaknesses of human nature. It is at least magnanimous to punish the powerful, and not visit with the greatest severity the weakest party, who has no claims upon you. We determined to execute the intention and fulfil the purpose of that Committee, which was unanimous in its opinion—which was composed of men in whose impartiality and integrity we reposed confidence; and it was because they were above all suspicion that we thought ourselves safe if we adopted the conclusions they drew. I must say, considering the situation of Mr. Wray, his age, and his being a barrister, to be visited on the part of the Secretary of State with severe disapprobation, and to have the expression of it published to the world, and laid on the Table of this House, is an ample measure of punishment. I know not what the noble Lord may think of it; but next to the absolute deprivation of office, I can conceive no penalty more serious than has been already inflicted upon Mr. Wray. What is the object of punishment in this and every other case? It is to deter from similar conduct in future. If that be your present object, can you justly charge my right hon. Friend with undue favour? If you cannot, if you believe that to an honourable mind, to a man who, as a barrister, has enjoyed the respect of an honourable and high-minded profession, and who now meets a public rebuke, this must be a severe penalty. You may think public duty requires you to go still further; but if you do, I think you will push punishment beyond its legitimate object. But, above all, I think you will involve us in blame unjustly, because our object has been the fulfilment of the intentions of your own tribunal. Even if we have erred on the side of lenity, it has not been from a desire to protect the powerful; it has been consistent with an earnest wish to do everything that justice towards Parliament requires; to do everything that for the sake both of present punishment and future example the offences committed require.

Mr. Hume considered that Captain Boldero had been harshly treated. Corruption could not be in any way laid to his charge; and it was against that their animadversion was directed. He felt deep regret for the position in which Mr. Wray was placed; he had known that gentleman for twenty years, and never observed any but the most honourable conduct in him; he felt great pain for the rebuke which Mr. Wray had received on account of the late transaction. So far from thinking that they ought to go further, as his hon. Friend asked them, he thought the animadversion of the right hon. Gentleman sufficient, though he was not prepared to deny its justice. He blamed Mr. Bonham, who ought, from his position, to have been the last man to receive such an indication of the railway company's good opinion; he blamed Mr. Wray for having been the means of carrying out the objects of the company; but he should remark, that the whole case against Mr. Wray ended there. That was the whole extent of it, and he did not believe that it showed any corruption; there had been no previous bargaining between Mr. Wray and Mr. Bonham; and whilst he regretted that Mr. Wray had lent himself to such a proceeding—than which nothing deserved more to be deprecated—yet he thought they had done sufficient in the matter, inasmuch as Mr. Wray and Mr. Bonham had not previously communicated upon the subject of this transfer of shares. He was of opinion that Mr. Wray had been grievously punished by the censure of the right hon. Baronet opposite—a censure which had been extensively circulated, and which, to a man of sensitive mind, such as he knew Mr. Wray to be, was a very severe punishment. Feeling that enough had been already done in reference to this matter, he should vote against the Motion of the hon. Member for Lambeth.

Viscount Ebrington said, that whilst the mode of proceeding was so severe against those who elected Members for Parliament who received bribes, it appeared strange that hon. Members should feel so little disposed to take any active course when the charge was against those in a higher sphere. The speech of the right hon. Secretary of State for the Home Department rather surprised him, for it treated the proceedings of the Committee as if they had been all confined to a few sentences at the conclusion, and as if there had been no proof of Mr. Wray having been instrumental in conveying those shares to Mr. Bonham. Agreeing with the noble Lord the Member for London, that it was most desirable to preserve the purity of the House of Commons, and particularly at a time when so much excitement prevailed in the money market, he would support the Motion of the hon. Member for Lambeth.

Mr. Ward feared that his vote, which would be with the hon. Member for Montrose, would bring upon him the censure of the noble Lord behind him (Lord Ebrington). The question which they had to decide was, whether the punishment which had been already inflicted was or was not proportionate to the offence which had been committed. They were not to decide upon the fallibility or infallibility of the Secretary of State for the Home Department; but they were to consider whether they would affirm a Resolution which would, if carried, inflict utter ruin on a man who up to the time when that charge was made, had never been accused of any conduct incompatible with his official duties or his high personal character; a man who, it must be admitted, had considerable good qualities, when even in the heat of party he had friends on both sides of the House. Mr. Wray had been censured by his official superior; and that censure had been almost doubled by the speech of the noble Lord, his predecessor in office. He was sure that the hon. Member for Lambeth was actuated by conscientious motives in the course which he had taken; but he could not agree with him in thinking that the House ought to agree to his Motion. The hon. Member ought to recollect, that the House had done all that it could to protect the purity of the tribunals which were connected with it, by which matters affecting private rights were decided; and that nothing could be more advantageous to the public, as compared with another, than the present system of regulating their Committees compared with the odious system which prevailed in 1836. Under the system which prevailed in 1836, individuals who had private interests to advance, attended the Committee, and urged those interests, in some cases, as far as they could. That system had been altogether reformed by the House; and the result of it was, that not the slightest suspicion attached to any of their Committees—a fact that was of very great importance, when they recollected the unparalleled amount of money which was concerned in the cases that had been before the various Committees of the House of Commons during this Session. Parties who were concerned might have complained of the judgment which a Committee of the House of Commons had displayed, or they might have complained that a sufficient time had not been allowed to individuals to be heard; but there had not been, as far as he could understand, an idea of a shadow of a shade of a complaint of any corrupt motive on the part of their Committees during this Session. He had the authority of Mr. Wray for stating that there was a very great misunderstanding abroad, to the effect that Mr. Bonham was at one period in debt to Mr. Wray. The fact was, that Mr. Bonham had never solicited any assistance from Mr. Wray, and that no such pecuniary relations existed between them. There had been no previous understanding between Mr. Wray and Mr. Bonham, and no advantage whatever had been obtained or demanded by Mr. Wray, who had been sufficiently punished. He had been severely censured by his superior; and the House would act harshly and unfeelingly if they went further with the matter, and ran down small game, by affirming the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Lambeth. He should prefer giving a direct negative to the Resolution of the hon. Member for Lambeth; and for that purpose he hoped the hon. Member who had moved the previous question as an Amendment would withdraw it, in order to allow a direct negative to be given to the Motion.

Colonel Peel expressed his high opinion of his two Friends who had resigned their offices, and assured the House that he had been one of those most anxious to have the whole case investigated when the charge was made. Indeed, so desirous was he to have this investigation, that if no one else had brought it forward, he (Colonel Peel) had determined to bring it forward, although he had no personal interest in the matter, as he never had any railroad shares in his life. His hon. Friends had expressed to him their sense of the kindness and courtesy of the Committee towards them; and he felt it his duty to state that feeling to the House. With respect to the North Kent Railway, his two hon. Friends, having seen from what since occurred that it was indiscreet on their part that shares should be nominally held by them, as the public, not knowing that the shares were held but nominally by them, would be less inclined to depend on their decisions in consequence of that holding of shares. It appeared perfectly clear from all the transactions, that neither of his hon. Friends had availed themselves of the knowledge of the assent of the Master General of the Ordnance to go to the market and purchase shares, or make any pecuniary profit. When his hon. Friend (Captain Boldero) was aware of the assent of the Master General of the Ordnance to three railways, he made no use of his knowledge to buy shares, or avail himself of any advantage from that knowledge, which showed that he had no disposition to avail himself of his official position for his private interest. It might be necessary for him to inform the House that Mr. Bonham had stated in a letter that Mr. Wray had never even indirectly alluded to his (Mr. Bonham's) conduct on the South Eastern Railway Committee; and it was not until after the Royal Assent had been given to the Bill that he got 100 reserved shares. On reference to the proceedings of the Committee, it appeared that in the divisions, the majorities were such as to show that Mr. Bonham's vote could not have carried the question in those cases. He was confident that his two Friends were most honourable men, and that anything which could affect their character, would be felt by them more severely than any worldly loss.

Sir John Easthope said, that he felt called upon to discharge a very painful duty in giving his vote on this occasion. The man who would not feel it painful to be obliged by his sense of duty to sanction a Motion which would bear so strongly upon an individual with a large family, such as Mr. Wray had been described to be by his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, was a man whose feelings he did not envy. He intended to vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Lambeth, solely from a sense of justice; he could have no other feeling, for he had never seen Mr. Wray, nor had he ever had the slightest communication with him. He participated fully in all those feelings of personal respect which had been expressed towards an individual whose name had been brought forward in relation to those transactions, for he had the pleasure of personally knowing him, and he was gratified to find that the general feeling of the House had perfectly acquitted the hon. and gallant Officer to whom he alluded, of corrupt or dishonourable conduct—he meant Captain Boldero, who, notwithstanding, had yet felt it needful to retire from the public service. Nothing could be more gratifying to him (Sir John Easthope) than to find that this acquittal was the universal opinion of the House. He believed that the acceptance of Captain Boldero's resignation was due to public opinion, and to the character of the public men of this country before the world. Approving both of the hon. and gallant Officer for resigning his office, and of the course which the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government had felt himself called on to pursue, he could not agree with the hon. Member for Sheffield, that he (Sir J. Easthope) was joining with those who would destroy a deserving man with a large family, merely because he would adopt the same rule with regard to Mr. Wray which had been adopted with respect to Captain Boldero and Mr. Bonham. He regretted very much to feel obliged to vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Lambeth; but he would ask the House to consider the opinions of the public with regard to their conduct in this matter—to reflect upon the probable feelings of those of an humbler class than that to which Mr. Wray belonged, if the House were to pass by his conduct with comparative impunity. He was not disposed to question the motives of those who might vote against the Motion, or to attribute to them any desire to acquiesce in the improper conduct of Mr. Wray. He did not attribute unworthy motives to those who were opposed to the Motion of the hon. Member for Lambeth; but he strongly objected to the right of the hon. Member for Sheffield to say that those who voted for the Motion were seeking to ruin a man because they were desirous that the same course should be adopted towards him whi h had been taken with regard to Captain Boldero and Mr. Bonham.

Sir R. Inglis said, though appointed a Member of the Committtee, he did not attend, because, having been physically unable to do so the first day, he did not think it right to join it subsequently. He had, however, followed with deeply painful, but still he hoped judicial interests, the proceedings day by day, and he felt that the Resolutions of the Committee had fallen too severely on all three of the Gentlemen affected by it; and if that was his opinion of the Report, of course he looked with less favour on the Motion of the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Hawes) who carried the Resolutions of the Committee far beyond the line they had originally drawn, and subjected to severer punishment than they had intended the individual whose conduct the House was then discussing. The hon. Member for Sheffield had made an appeal ad misericordiam on behalf of that gentleman. He was not insensible to such an appeal; but sitting there judicially, he hoped he would not suffer any such feelings to influence his opinion. He thought it was due to Mr. Wray to appeal not to their mercy, but to their justice; and he hoped, therefore, that his hon. Friend who had moved the previous question, would withdraw that Amendment, and let the sense of the House be taken "aye" or "no," upon the direct Motion. If Mr. Wray were guilty beyond the measure of guilt in which every Member of that House then in Parliament must acknowledge they were involved nine years ago before the House had reformed itself, he would not stand there to defend him or advocate his case. He thought he could say that he knew the same thing was done by another individual on the opposite side of the House with reference to the very same question; and when such was the case, and the matter had not occurred this year or last year, which would have made the case different, he hoped the House would negative the proposition of the hon. Member for Lambeth.

Mr. Mitchell felt it his duty to vote for the Motion. He did not think it just to Captain Boldero and Mr. Bonham to remove them from office, and suffer Mr. Wray—who, after reading the whole of the evidence, he thought the more guilty—to retain his office. He did not censure the Government for the course they had taken in the matter; but the Committee, he thought, were to blame for the way in which they had acted in this respect.

Sir J. Graham wished to say one word on the Motion now before the House, and he confessed he hoped that, notwithstanding the opinions expressed by various parties who had spoken, the hon. Member for North Lancashire (Mr. W. Patten) would adhere to his proposition. He thought "the previous question" was the direct mode of meeting the Motion of the hon. Member for Lambeth. He (Sir J. Graham) should have a difficulty in negativing the proposition that the conduct of Mr. Wray was deserving of censure; besides, he felt that there was force in what had fallen from the hon. Member who had just sat down. He thought if they would directly negative the Motion, the conduct of Captain Boldero and Mr. Bonham would appear more culpable than that of Mr. Wray—a conclusion at which he certainly could not arrive. He thought the position of Captain Boldero and Mr. Wray had rendered their conduct more amenable to censure; but, looking at the merits and demerits of the case, he was bound to say he did not consider the conduct of Mr. Wray as less culpable than that of Captain Boldero and Mr. Bonham; and he thought that would appear to be the case if they were to negative the last Resolution. He hoped, therefore, the hon. Member would adhere to his Amendment.

Mr. B. Escott would not vote for the Motion if he felt it implied any censure on the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the view he had taken of the case; for he felt that the most honourable and upright men might have taken a lenient view of the matter. He also thought the Report of the Committee justified the course the right hon. Gentleman had taken. It was the Committee that had brought them into their present difficulty. The Committee ought to have distinguished between the degrees of culpability of the persons charged with offences before them. He rejoiced on one account that the question had been brought forward, and that was, that it had been the means of eliciting from the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that noble testimony to the character of those two honourable men, Captain Boldero and Mr. Bonham, and of confirming that testimony by practical experience of their merits. What struck him more in this than in the former debate was, that Captain Boldero and Mr. Bonham, through their own sense of honour, and through a high appreciation of their sense of duty on the part of the Government, had been visited with punishment, while Mr. Wray, the really guilty party, escaped. The question was, had Mr. Wray, or had he not, offered money or money's worth to a Member of that House for the discharge of some sort of function or other which belonged to him as a Member of Parliament? If he did so, he was guilty of an offence for which he ought to be visited with the censure of that House. He knew of an instance in which, within the last few days, a Member of that House was offered money in order to make him discharge a certain duty in the House in a manner which would be most acceptable to the person who would pay the amount. The hon. Gentleman immediately caused it to be intimated to the party that he would throw his petition into the fire unless the offer were withdrawn.

Mr. Hawes rose amidst cries of "divide," "divide." He said that he would detain the House but for a moment, in adverting to one or two points, which he thought it his duty to refer to, before the vote was taken. The right hon. Gentleman opposite fell into an error, in stating that there was an alteration effected in the Report of the Committee, and that words which imported that Mr. Wray should be dismissed were struck out, and that milder terms had been substituted in their stead. The words which first stood in the Report were to the effect that "the conduct of Mr. Wray deserved the immediate notice of the Secretary of State;" and the words substituted were, that "conduct deserved serious animadversion." These words had been substituted after serious reflection, and the Committee had reason to think that these words would lead to the dismissal of the man whose conduct was so animadverted upon. In regard to Mr. Hignett, the words of the Report were of a decisive character. But did the Committee say that Mr. Bonham and Captain Boldero should be dismissed? Why, then, did the Government accept their resignation? In accepting the resignation of Captain Boldero and Mr. Bonham, they had gone beyond the words of the Report. Was it an objection that, in the present case, they should do the same, if reason existed for their so doing? Two points had been wholly overlooked by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The first was the omission which had been alluded to, as having taken place in the letter. Mr. Wray's was an offence against society, against that House, and against the Government. If the Government did not mark such conduct with their censure, they were open to the charge of being somewhat indifferent to the character of the public men whom they employ. The right hon. Gentleman was a great advocate of Parliamentary privilege. They had a Resolution which declared such an offence a breach of privilege; and yet the right hon. Gentleman did not condescend to notice that. He defied them to negative the Resolution now before the House. The main facts were incontestable; and if that were so, let the consequences follow. The Committee, when the matter was under their consideration, saw that, whilst they were dealing as leniently as they could with the offences before them, these offences must in the end be visited by loss of situation to the parties implicated. He lamented the whole matter as much as any one could. He was keenly alive to the painfulness of the duty which now devolved upon him, but it was a duty from which he was not inclined to shrink. As to the charge of delay, when he moved for the letter of Mr. Wray, the right hon. Gentleman himself asked him if he intended to found a Motion upon it. He then said that he could not at the time give a decisive answer, but that the matter was subject to his future consideration. Within a week afterwards, there was a Notice upon the Table. He was somewhat surprised at what had fallen that evening from the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr.

Ward) and the hon. Baronet the Member for Oxford (Sir R. Inglis), who had said more to bring the House into contempt than he expected to have heard from such quarters. He denied the imputation cast upon the House by the hon. Member for Sheffield, when he said, that in 1830, there were not fifty Members in it who were not implicated, more or less, in transactions somewhat similar to these. He felt himself called upon to vindicate the character of the House from such aspersions. By not visiting with the only punishment which they could inflict such conduct as was now complained of, the Government seemed to sanction what appeared to be, at least, a direct act of bribery on the part of a public officer.

The House divided on the previous Question, namely, that that Question be now put:—Ayes 18; Noes 81: Majority 63.

The Income Tax.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed that an order had been made, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Manchester, for a return of the names of the Commissioners under the Income Tax, and the number of their attendances, but as it was found that this could not be conveniently made, he would now move to discharge it.

Mr. Fielden said, that there could be no difficulty in getting such a return He then objected to the present mode of assessment. When a party made a return, and that return was objected to, the Commissioners never furnished him with any reason why they doubted the return, although it was made upon oath. This was both scandalous and unjust. He had been so treated, and he knew others who had been similarly so. The hon. Member then went into a detail of the circumstances connected with the last appeal made by himself against the assessment made upon him; and assured the House that the question could not rest where it now was, as he would, early next Session, bring forward a Motion upon the subject. He hoped that, in the meantime, the public would be alive to the subject, and that all who, like himself, had been aggrieved, would come forward at the proper time, and cordially co-operate with him.

Mr. Scott wished for the names of the places at which the Commissioners met. In some places they met at public-houses, in portions of the country not populous. At Wolverhampton, the people had to go five miles distance, to the great public inconvenience. It was also remarked that the Commissioners were generally of one line of politics.

House adjourned at a quarter past eleven o'clock.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. From Bankers, and others, of Halifax, Leeds, and Bradford, for the Adoption of Measures to enforce the Free Navigation of the River La Plata.—By the Lord Chancellor, from a great number of places, in favour of the Small Debts Bill (No. 2); and from Merchants, Bankers, and others of the City of London, for Amendment of Law respecting Bankruptcy and Insolvency.—From Parishes of All Saints, and Killea, Donegal, aganst Tenants Compensation (Ireland) Bill.—From Findonagh, for Recognizing by Legal Enactment, the practice of Tenant Right (Ireland).

LONDON AND YORK RAILWAY.] The Marquess of Clanricarde presented two petitions, one from George Pryme, esq., of Cambridge, and at present proprietor of certain lands in the county of Huntingdon, through which this line proposed to pass; in one of which it was stated, that when this Company was first formed, the estimated cost of the line was 5,000,000*l.*; but subsequently, when the lands were surveyed by Mr. Cubitt, the estimated cost of the line lodged in the Parliamentary Office amounted to 6,500,000*l.* This was, of course, a much larger rate than was put forward when the original subscribers attached their names to the contract deed; and therefore he thought that in a court of equity they could not be called upon to pay more than the original estimate of the line. This was the statement contained in the first petition, which was a subject for the consideration of the Standing Orders' Committee. The second petition stated that this contract deed was entirely false and fictitious; that the names of persons amounting in their liabilities to 500,000*l.* were either not in existence, or incapable of being found; that they were wholly unable to pay any part of these sums, being paupers. With respect to a petition which he had presented on the previous evening upon this subject, he begged to say that a great mistake had arisen from a similarity of names. The petition to which he referred had alleged that a Mr. Baxter was a person totally unable to pay the sum for which he had subscribed his name. The petitioner, however, had since made fuller inquiry on the subject, and wished now to state that he had been mistaken in his former information, for that Mr. Baxter, who was connected with the line, was a man of undoubted respectability. This was only one case; but there were cases of the same kind infinitely beyond anything in the Dublin and Galway Bill. He would not weary their Lordships by going through all the cases, but would merely refer to a few in order to show their nature. Their Lordships were aware that their Standing Orders required that the addresses of parties signing the contract deed should be correctly stated; and the directors of the Dublin and Galway Company were thought censurable because they had not exercised sufficient vigilance in this respect. One of the names to the deed to which he was anxious to direct their attention was that of John Theobalds, gentleman, said to reside in Finsbury-square, who had subscribed to the amount of 25,000*l.*; he was informed that no such person was known at that address. There was also in the contract deed the name of an individual who had figured in the Dublin and Galway Railway case (W. Shackell), who was down for 5000*l.*, and who was understood to be a half-pay officer in the receipt of 54*l.* a year, but who appeared as a subscriber in different railway schemes to the amount of 41,500*l.* The address of another, E. J. Durham, whose name was down for 12,200*l.*, was stated to be in Watling-street; but it appeared that he did not reside there. In the case of another individual who was down for 12,500*l.*, a false address was found to have been given. This individual was discovered to be a clerk in the Australian Trust Company, and it was therefore impossible to suppose him responsible for so large an amount. Another individual, whom he would not name, was a curate in a parish in Kent. He might be worth all the money for which he appeared responsible in various railway schemes; but his name appeared for 25,000*l.* in different projects, and stood for 10,000*l.* in this line. Another individual, who was down for 25,000*l.*, was represented to be in poor circumstances, and had once resided at the address stated in the deed, but had quitted it. He knew these sums to be correct, for he had compared them with the contract deed. Another clerk of the Australian Trust Company was down for upwards of 50,000*l.* There were several more cases of the same kind, but he trusted he had stated enough to establish the necessity of referring the matter to a Committee. There were also two brothers named Guernsey, sons of a charwoman living in a garret, in Angel-court, one of whom had signed for 12,500*l.*, and the other for 25,000*l.*, the latter being a porter to a wine merchant named Hitchcock. These two brothers, excellent persons, no doubt, but who were receiving about a guinea and a half a week between them, were down for no less a sum than 37,500*l.* One of them, Charles Guernsey, stated that he never applied for any shares, but that a stockbroker brought him letters of allotment to the above amount. When he signed the deed, the broker took the scrip, and he never received one farthing; that he was only nineteen years of age, and in the receipt of only 12*s.* a week. He hoped he would institute a suit against the broker, for there could be no doubt that some person or other had sold that scrip at a considerable premium. He need hardly say more to convince their Lordships of the necessity of inquiry. The Houses of Parliament were the only places to which the public could look for security, and it was with this view that the Standing Orders were framed; but the Standing Orders did not afford security where there was no opposition; and even where there was opposition, it was extremely difficult to detect such cases as these. These cases had been only inquired into within the week, the attention of the opponents of the London and York Bill having been directed to the subject by what took place in the Dublin and Galway case; and there could be no doubt that, unless some change were made, it would be almost impossible for any Railway Bill to pass through Parliament. He had omitted to state to their Lordships that a clerk of the Company was down for 5,000*l.*, a fact which brought home blame in the most direct way to those parties who received the thanks of Lord Brougham for the zeal, perspicuity, vigilance, activity, and scrutinizing rigour which they exercised in getting up their reference, and in searching into every matter connected with the railway, and whom that noble and learned Lord held up as an example to all engaged in similar undertakings. The residence of a person down for a considerable sum in the deed was stated to be No. 22, Norfolk-street, Strand, although a reference to the Directory would have shown that to be the address of Messrs. Ommanney. A grosser case of neglect could not be conceived; nothing of this kind was shown against the unfortunate Dublin and Galway Company. He begged leave to move that the petition be referred to a Select Committee to inquire into its allegations. Their Lordships would remember that in the Dublin and Galway case the Bill was delayed until these matters had been investigated.

Lord Monteagle presented a petition which had been entrusted to him by most respectable parties subscribers to the said railway, declaring that the statements in the petition presented by Henry Bruce, of Mincing-lane, surgeon, with respect to the fictitious and false insertion of names, were unfounded, and that the petitioners were perfectly prepared to prove this, if their Lordships would direct an investigation, which they prayed might be granted without delay.

The Earl of Wicklow said, if the case were precisely in the same position as the Dublin and Galway Railway was, he should not object to the same course being adopted, although the noble Marquess had by no means made out so strong a case as had been established in reference to that line. The difference between the cases was this. The Dublin and Galway Bill was not, in the first instance, opposed, and passed the Standing Orders' Committee without opposition. Now this he conceived to be an opposed Bill; it had not yet been brought before the Standing Orders' Committee, and these petitions had been presented in due time for the Standing Orders' Committee to investigate their allegations, and it was not, therefore, necessary to appoint a Select Committee specially for that purpose. Such being the case, he certainly should oppose the Motion of the noble Marquess.

The Earl of Shaftesbury said, it would not fall within the province of the Standing Orders' Committee to investigate the matters referred to in the petition; they could only inquire whether the parties whose names appeared in the contract deed had actually subscribed it.

The Earl of Devon was understood to say, that if cases such as these were established, the contract deed, instead of being a safeguard to the public, would only serve to delude them. He had foretold, on a former occasion, that instances of this kind would be brought forward in every case; and the result would be, that it would be impossible to pass any Bill through Parliament. Now, here was a Railway Bill which had undergone the most searching inquiry ever known in such a case before a Committee of the House of Commons, which sat upwards of eighty days; and now, after undergoing such an ordeal — after the enormous expense entailed on the parties— it was proposed that they should not be allowed to proceed, because it was alleged that a certain portion—not a very large one—of those who had subscribed the contract deed were not persons of substance. With regard to the facts stated in the first petition, in reference to the difference between the original amount of the capital stated—namely, 5,000,000*l.*, and the last estimate of 6,500,000*l.*, he presumed that in this, as in all other Bills, a power was given to borrow a sum which would be sufficient to make up the difference. He could not accede to the proposition of the noble Marquess.

Lord Beaumont had totally disapproved of the proceedings in the Dublin and Galway case; but having adopted that course, he did not see how they could depart from it now. He perfectly agreed with his noble Friend opposite in thinking that contract deeds were useless as a protection to the public; but, at the same time, he was of opinion that to abolish altogether the present system, would be equivalent to defeating railway projects altogether. He would not go so far as some, and maintain that the original subscribers were only to serve as conduits by which the shares might reach the hands of responsible parties; but he believed that unless they allowed parties to be put down for larger sums than perhaps on full consideration they might be thought able to pay, they would totally defeat the construction of railways.

The Marquess of Clanricarde: What security would the public have that the work would be carried out?

Lord Beaumont: The parties who had obtained shares would always be able to dispose of them, although, perhaps, at a reduced rate. Some loss might be sustained; but he maintained that the real liability of the parties to the contract was limited to the deposit paid; for the shares became property, and might be disposed of like any other description of property.

Lord Redesdale supported the Motion. A certain number of errors might unavoidably creep into a subscription list; but it would be for the Committee to decide whether proper care had been exercised by the company. In the Dublin and Galway case, it was decided that due care had not been taken; in the London and York case, the Committee might possibly decide that due care had been used, and the Bill might be allowed to pass. Subscription contracts had undoubtedly been much neglected; but he hoped that, in consequence of what had taken place, the case would be different in future.

Lord Campbell said, that in his opinion, that application could not be refused. It should be remembered that the Standing Orders' Committee could not institute any inquiry into the most important allegations in the petition. It followed, therefore, inevitably, that the appointment of the Committee moved for by his noble Friend should be granted.

The Earl of Wicklow said, that as the Standing Orders' Committee could not inquire into the whole of those allegations, he thought that the House could not refuse the appointment of the Committee.

The Marquess of Clanricarde said, that the correctness of the subscription list was the only guarantee which the Legislature or the country had that the works could ever be completed. He hoped that his Motion would at once be agreed to.

Motion put and agreed to.

Small Debts Bill (No. 2).] The Lord Chancellor presented a petition from the Liverpool Guardian Society for the Protection of Trade, which stated that their society consisted of 1,800 members, comprising merchants, bankers, and traders, but chiefly the latter class, associated together for the protection of commerce, and that they were most anxious that the Bill which had been introduced into their Lordships' House for extending the law for the recovery of Small Debts should be passed into law. He had also a petition to present from a number of persons who were deputies, at present assembled in this metropolis, from all the great trading towns and cities of the country, praying their Lordships to pass this Bill in its present shape, and particularly directing their Lordships' attention to the 9th Clause, and the clauses consequential upon it. It was necessary that, in introducing this Bill in its present shape to the notice of their Lordships'

House, he should offer a few remarks respecting it. Their Lordships were aware, that in the last Session of Parliament a Bill had passed into law for abolishing arrest, even in execution, for debts under 20*l.* He had always considered that measure as a most salutary law, and it never had been, he believed, the desire of either House of Parliament that it should be revoked. In consequence of inconveniences which were found to arise since the passing of that law in respect of the recovery of debts under 20*l.*, a Bill had been introduced in the present Session by a noble and learned Friend of his (Lord Brougham), now absent, for the purpose of extending the facilities of the former Bill to debts of a lower amount. That Bill had been referred to a Select Committee up-stairs, before whom it had undergone a careful examination, and after being again brought before the House their Lordships adopted it. It then went down to the other House of Parliament, where many Amendments were introduced, and the Bill so amended now came before their Lordships for their final decision on these Amendments. He would next proceed to explain to their Lordships the nature and character of these amendments. They were of a twofold character—one class referred distinctly, and in the ordinary course, to the Bill as it had left their Lordships' House; and the Amendments under this head ought, he thought, with one exception, to be agreed to by the House. The other class of Amendments were to be regarded, in point of fact, as additions to the Bill. On leaving their Lordships' House the Bill had eight clauses, but it had since received an addition of about twenty clauses, referring to objects to which he would presently direct their Lordships' attention. The first class of Amendments in the original Bill seemed to be principally verbal amendments with one exception. He proposed to make some alterations in these Amendments, to only one of which he would beg to call their Lordships' attention. A power had been given to the Commissioners of Bankruptcy to call before them persons who were indebted in sums less than 20*l.*, in order to examine them, to sift their conduct, and ultimately, if dissatisfied with the explanation given, to commit them to prison. The same power had been given to the Small Debts Courts, which were presided over by a barrister or attorney of ten years' standing, or by a special pleader. Now, the Amendment of the Commons to which he objected was, that the Commissioners of Bankruptcy, whom he considered to be altogether the most competent persons to decide on subjects of this nature, were to be deprived of the power conferred under the Bill, except where an action of debt had been brought for the amount in one of the superior courts, and judgment pronounced. As he did not anticipate that any person having ordinary judgment and understanding would in future bring actions for debts of less than 20*l.* in the superior courts, he considered that the effect of this Amendment would be, that the Bankruptcy Commissioners, whom he should regard as the most competent parties to decide in such matters, would lose all jurisdiction under the Bill. He would therefore propose to their Lordships to disagree to this Amendment. The history of the Amendment was not a little curious. When the Bill was sent down to the other House of Parliament, it had been entrusted to the charge of the present Solicitor General; but when that hon. and learned Member had been called out of town in the pursuit of his professional duties, the Amendment was introduced, he did not know by whom, or from what quarter, and adopted. With respect to the other class of Amendments, they all turned on the effect of the 9th Section, which had been introduced by the House of Commons, and were, so to say, consequential upon it. That section gave a power to Her Majesty in Council to extend the jurisdiction in point of locality of the Small Debts Courts, and also to extend their jurisdiction in point of amount to all sums up to 20*l.* It proceeded farther, and went on to provide that Her Majesty in Council should have the power of contracting the jurisdiction of Small Debts Courts, where such jurisdiction interfered with that of another court. As no person in trade of ordinary prudence and judgment would now bring an action in one of the superior courts for a debt under 20*l.*, this provision might be regarded as a necessary consequence of the Act of last Session. He thought, therefore, that that 9th Clause was a wise provision, and that it had been properly framed; and if it had been introduced while the Bill had been in their Lordships' House, he would have given it his warm support; or if it had come up from the other House as a separate Bill, he had no doubt whatever but that their Lordships would have agreed to it. The other eighteen or nineteen new clauses he regarded as necessarily consequent upon this clause; and therefore, if their Lordships had no objection to the adoption of the new principle contained in the 9th Clause, he should recommend them to adopt all these Amendments. They established a new system and new tribunals; and the question for their Lordships' consideration was, whether a provision for establishing this new system and these new tribunals could be agreed to by the House in one stage, and after one discussion. It was certainly inconsistent with the ordinary Parliamentary usage to adopt the principle of a measure, and to consider all its details at the same time. If the other House of Parliament had sent up a separate Bill on this subject, their Lordships would have an opportunity of deciding on the principle of the measure at the second reading, and of afterwards considering the details in Committee, and on the bringing up of the Report; and they could then finally adopt or reject the Bill, after the most mature deliberation. They had no such opportunity at present, and they should, therefore, consider whether, on one discussion on these Amendments, they could venture to adopt them. He thought the Amendments were, as he before stated, useful, and called for by the circumstances; and a point which was, perhaps, not altogether an unimportant one for their consideration was, that in the Session before the last their Lordships had themselves passed a Bill for the establishment of local Courts, which had been sent down to the other House of Parliament, and which contained a clause exactly corresponding with this Amendment. His noble Friend near him (Lord Wharncliffe) had just called his attention to another Amendment which was made in the provision for levying executions under decrees made in cases of Small Debts. It was known to their Lordships that there were always exceptions of wearing apparel and some other like necessary matters; but the Commons' Amendment in the present instance excepted bedding, wearing apparel, and such necessaries, and all tools used in the trade of the debtor, and also other articles to the extent of 10*l.* He apprehended that that exception would include all the property of a large portion of the class of persons who would be most interested in this Bill; and he was induced to come to that conclusion the more readily, as he had seen advertisements in the newspapers, in which persons about to marry were offered all the furniture necessary for a room for 10*l.* He would leave it to their Lordships to decide whether they would not agree to these Amendments with the alterations which he had suggested in them.

Lord Campbell said, he felt himself placed in a state of very great embarrassment on this occasion, in consequence of the want of unanimity which appeared to exist among the Members of Her Majesty's Government in the two Houses of Parliament. He entirely concurred in the view taken by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, respecting the Amendments of the Commons, and the alterations which it was necessary to have made in them. He thought these Amendments to their Lordships' Bill could be safely adopted, with the exception to which his noble and learned Friend had referred; but then came the new Bill which the Commons had added to the measure, and with respect to that he felt, though he would not take upon himself the responsibility of rejecting it, that it was impossible to consider it fully and satisfactorily on the present occasion. He should, however, enter his solemn protest against the course that had been adopted. Various petitions had been presented on this subject in the early part of the Session, and two grievances in particular pointed out. One of these was the absence of any means of examining into the nature of debts under 20*l.*, and the other referred to debtors enjoying salaries and annuities, and to the fact of there being no means of compelling such persons to pay their debts out of these funds. Her Majesty's Government in this House appointed a Select Committee to take the matter into consideration. That Committee had been attended generally by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, and by his other noble and learned Friend not now present (Lord Brougham), who seemed to act as the organ of the Government on the occasion. The result was, that remedies for these evils were pointed out, and the Bill which had passed their Lordships' House was founded upon the decision to which the Committee had come. Her Majesty's Government had entirely approved of the Bill, and had intimated that nothing more ought to be done during the present Session. When the Bill, however, went down to the House of Commons, Her Majesty's Government there, as he had been informed, took an entirely different view of the matter; and the Solicitor General, under the auspices, as he had heard, of the Home Secretary, introduced no less than twenty new clauses, involving one of the most important questions that had passed through Parliament within the present Session. His noble and learned Friend admitted that the usages, and the rights and privileges of their Lordships' House, required that these new clauses should have been introduced as a distinct measure; and that they would be, therefore, justified in rejecting them. This was not, however, the only instance during the present Session in which the House had reason to regret that a better understanding did not exist between the Members of Her Majesty's Government in that and in the other House of Parliament. For instance, a Bill had passed their Lordships' House to prevent tollhouses in Scotland being licensed for the sale of intoxicating drinks. That measure had been supported by all the Members of Her Majesty's Government in this House; but when it had got to the other House of Parliament, the whole of the Members of Her Majesty's Government there, with the Prime Minister at their head, voted against it; and the Bill was thus lost. Another instance of a similar kind was to be found in the fate of the Bill which had been introduced for abolishing deodands. That Bill had been highly praised by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, who had given Her Majesty's consent for its introduction. It had been passed through their Lordships' House, without even a whisper of disapprobation against it, and with the unanimous support of the Members of Her Majesty's Government in this House. The Bill had been subsequently lost on a point of form in the other House; but a similar measure had been immediately afterwards introduced in the Commons' House of Parliament for abolishing deodands. Precisely the same principle was involved in the second Bill as in the first; and yet, while the Bill met with the unanimous support of the Members of Her Majesty's Government in their Lordships' House, it was unanimously opposed by Her Majesty's Government in the Commons' House of Parliament. He alluded to these matters as instances in which the Parliament and the public suffered in consequence of no understanding existing between the Members of Her Majesty's Government in the two Houses. He regretted that the opinion of his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) was not more attended to by his Colleagues in matters of legal reference, and more especially by the Secretary of State for the Home Department. With respect to the measure now before the House, it was a mockery to oblige a person to sue in the Court of Queen's Bench or Exchequer for a debt under 20*l.*; but he doubted whether it would not be better to remodel local courts, or extend the county courts, rather than give more power to the courts of conscience, which were often the cause of great vexation and abuse.

The Lord Chancellor begged to explain one circumstance. This was not a Government measure. When it went down to the other House of Parliament, it was taken up by a learned Gentleman who was not at that time Solicitor General. [Lord Campbell: He was about to be.] It was before he knew he would be; and it would not have been consistent if, on account of his change of position, he had abandoned the measure. He admitted, however, that on its going down from that to the other House, although it was not a Government measure, it was deemed wise and proper, and as such was supported. With reference to the Deodand Bill, it was not considered a Government measure; he, for one, supported it; but it was open to any other Member of the Government to oppose it. It went down to the other House connected with another measure; that other measure was rejected, and the Deodand Bill, as he apprehended, was on that account rejected also. He wished also to say, that he had added an Amendment to the 9th Clause; he thought it right that parties who would be affected should have notice of any change, and it was, therefore, to be advertised for a month in the London Gazette before it was made.

The Earl of Haddington said, that he and his noble Friends near him took part in the Turnpike Trusts Bill as private country gentlemen connected with Scotland, and not as Members of the Government.

The Lord Chancellor said, that as precedents were important, he would remind noble Lords of one little point. He thought he recollected sending down a Bill from that House to the other House with forty or fifty new clauses and amendments—he alluded to the Municipal Act Amendment Bill—which the other House very kindly adopted.

Lord Monteagle said, he regarded this matter as affording a very bad precedent. He, however, thought it better, under all the circumstances, to adopt the course recommended by his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor.

Lord Wharncliffe conceived that this was no Government Bill, and it was well to express their disapprobation of the circumstance that, when a Bill of eight clauses was sent down, one of twenty-five clauses should be sent up; in fact, a new Bill, which that House could not discuss on one occasion only. Still, under all the circumstances of this case, and after the explanation that had been given, he was not disposed to vote against this Bill, though he held himself as much at liberty to vote against it as against any Railway Bill that had come before them.

Earl Fitzhardinge expressed his gratification that Amendments which were calculated to afford so much benefit to the community had met with the approbation of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. No less than 3,000,000*l.* of debts under 20*l.* had been contracted to tradesmen in this country; and in Birmingham alone the debts under 20*l.* in one year amounted to 100,000*l.* The passing of this measure would give relief to those classes which it was impossible for them to obtain in any other manner.

Lord Campbell explained. He was perfectly well aware of the distinction respecting Government Bills; but what he complained of was, that measures which were formally not Government Bills should be strenuously advocated and supported by all the Members of Her Majesty's Government in one House, and as strenuously opposed by the Members of the Government in the other House of Parliament. He was sorry that his noble and learned Friend should have referred to the precedent he had cited. He had hoped that his noble and learned Friend had repented of the acts to which he had alluded, and he regretted to find that such was not the case. He very well remembered that, on the occasion alluded to, the noble and learned Lord was regarded as a giant of obstruction to all measures coming before their Lordships' House.

Commons' Amendments agreed to.

LONDON AND YORK RAILWAY.] Mr. B. Denison presented a petition from the London and York Railway Company, denying the statements contained in the petition of the Chairman of the Cambridge and Lincoln Company, presented by the hon. Member for Lambeth on Monday. They stated that in consequence of the discussion last night, they had given directions to ascertain to what extent the allegations contained in the petition were true, and although only a few hours had elapsed since the investigation had commenced, he had the satisfaction to state that, of the first class, which contained thirty-five names, they had seen twenty-three during the day, six more within the last two hours, and three they were unable to find. Of the other class, containing twenty names, who were stated to be in indigent circumstances and unable to pay their subscription, several had already offered to do so. They also stated that the petitioner was vice chairman of a company competing with the London and York Railway. He moved that the petition be printed with the Votes.

Mr. Astell defended the course taken by the directors of the London and York Company, who had spared no expense or labour in their endeavours to ascertain the bonâ fide character of the parties to whom shares were allotted.

Mr. Hawes said, that after this petition the House was imperiously called upon to institute some inquiry, and no man was more ready than himself to enter into it. If an attempt had been made to make use of him to interfere with the progress of an important public work, he would not let the matter rest; but he had the personal assurance of the gentleman whose petition he presented, that the allegations were true in the main, and that he was able to substantiate them. It was clear that inquiry during the present Session was out of the question, but next Session he would gladly promote an inquiry into this subscription list and into the allegations against it.

Mr. Warburton said, that the House ought to consider in what manner it would proceed on an allegation of this kind aiming against the Bill in this stage of it. When a similar petition was brought to him respecting another Railway Bill, he said there were two ways of inquiring into the truth of the allegations—viz., by a Select Committee, or a Committee on the Bill; and he had said that he would not move for a Select Committee when the truth of the allegations could be inquired into by a Committee on the Bill. The parties were aware of all the circumstances which they now represented to the House when they were before the Committee. That was the proper tribunal to prosecute the inquiry, and, to inform itself upon the manner in which the subscription lists of all railways were made up. He trusted the House would not entertain the petition.

Mr. Wakley said, the petition presented by the hon. Member for Lambeth yesterday was allowed to be printed with the Votes, upon a distinct understanding that a Motion was to be founded upon it then; yet nothing appeared to be further from the thoughts of the hon. Member than to proceed with the petition. The Gentlemen opposite and those named in the petition considered themselves calumniated, and he thought they were right. The calumnies were printed with the Votes of the House, which were openly and publicly sold. He would warn the House that it was a dangerous practice they were beginning upon, and might lead them into much trouble. The hon. Member for Lambeth ought to name the party upon whose faith and information he undertook to present the petition. Yesterday the House was led to believe that the hon. Member had everything prepared to substantiate. [Mr. Hawes: I have. I am now prepared to go on.] There was no Notice on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member upon the subject. If the allegation of the petition were false, the hon. Member had incurred a very great responsibility; and he thought the House ought to know the name of the party upon whom the hon. Member relied, so that he might not be allowed to escape with impunity, if it should turn out that he had been deceiving the House for his own purposes. He would ask, how were the parties who had been misrepresented in so gross a manner as they now alleged, to obtain redress? It was a most serious thing to allege against any gentleman, but more particularly against one in business, that he was not able to meet the engagements he had entered into; and if there were the most remote probability of entering upon an inquiry and concluding it before the Session closed, it ought to be begun to-morrow, and prosecuted, even if the Committee sat from eight in the morning till eight in the evening.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer suggested the propriety of the House acting with great caution upon that occasion. The Committee on the Bill was the proper tribunal for entering into all such inquiries. But the parties there entered into a compromise, one party contracting not to bring one matter under the notice of the Committee, and the other party giving an equivalent. That being the case, was it fair or just that the party who had a perfect cognizance of all the facts he now alleged, when before the Committee, should come in upon the third reading of the Bill, and ask for a full inquiry into the facts at the public expense? As one petition had been printed with the Votes, let the House order the counter petition to be made public through the same channel, and some degree of justice would be done.

Mr. Brotherton: The whole mischief arose from a fraudulent compact entered into between the parties before the Standing Orders' Committee, in order to keep them in the dark. It was only when the parties quarrelled that the House became acquainted with the facts of the case.

Mr. T. Dumcombe: The right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not stated the facts of the case fairly. The prayer of the petition before the House went further than asking for an immediate inquiry. The petitioners prayed for leave to bring actions against their slanderer; they asked the leave of the House to bring actions for defamation. He thought that as to time, there was quite sufficient to enable a Committee to inquire so as to enable the parties, who said that they were aggrieved, to prosecute

Mr. Bruce, if the allegations made by him were false; and it would appear from the counter statement made, that there was no truth in these allegations. The House was bound to afford the means of immediate redress, if possible, and should not delay the matter till next Session. The petitioners wanted to be allowed to take the petition presented yesterday to a court of law, and to be enabled there to prove the falsity of its allegations, and that the parties who presented that petition were guilty of defamation. The opportunity should be afforded without delay, to those who considered themselves maligned to come forward and prove that they were substantial persons, and not indigent paupers, as some of them were alleged to be.

Mr. B. Denison said, that the parties presenting the petition of yesterday were guilty of making an attempt to impose upon the House in the discharge of its duties. The petition was presented for the purpose of staying the progress of a Bill before the House, and it was for the House to consider whether it would take up the matter, and determine whether it would submit to what appeared to him in the light of a serious breach of privilege. He had given notice of a Motion on Friday next, which he hoped the House would accede to, to enable the parties aggrieved to proceed in a legal way to vindicate their character from the aspersions cast upon them by the petition presented last night. He thought that it would be a scandalous proceeding if persons were to be permitted to make such allegations to the House as were contained in that petition, and the House were to refuse the parties aggrieved the means of redress.

Mr. Hawes wished to explain the position in which he stood with respect to the Select Committee which it was last night his intention to have moved for that day. After he had stated that he would move for such a Committee, the noble Lord the Member for Nottinghamshire (the Earl of Lincoln) stated that he would oppose the Motion. He thought, therefore, with the Government opposed to it, that it would be a perfect farce to move for such a Committee. He was now ready, however, relying on the assurances which had been given him, faithfully and diligently to prosecute the inquiry, notwithstanding all the asseverations which had been made by hon. Gentlemen on either side of the House.

The Earl of Lincoln rose to correct a mis-statement, or rather a mistake, into which the hon. Member had fallen. What he had stated, was, that he would support the hon. Gentleman's Motion for the printing of the petition, reserving to himself, until that day, to consider whether he would support the Motion, which it was understood was to follow it, for appointing a Select Committee, stating at the same time that his reason for so reserving himself was, that although it might be perfectly proper to appoint such a Committee under other circumstances, it was questionable whether at this period of the Session an inquiry should be commenced which might not be completed until the following Session. The greatest progress which such a Committee might be able to make this Session might be the obtaining an ex parte statement of the case; and it would be unfair, he thought, to close the proceedings at that stage, without giving the other parties an opportunity of rebutting it.

Mr. Hawes was ready to move for the Committee now, if the Government would support him.

The Motion that the petition be printed with the Votes was then agreed to.

Mr. Hawes then moved that the petition presented to the House by the Deputy Chairman of the Cambridge and Lincoln Railway be referred to a Select Committee. He hoped the House would agree to the Motion, and that they would permit the Members of the Committee to be named at once, so that the inquiry might be immediately commenced.

Mr. Warburton had seen cause, during the progress of the discussion, to alter somewhat the opinion which he entertained at the early part of it. He agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that if the House granted Committees of this nature, for the purpose of inquiring into fraudulent subscription lists, and if these inquiries were to be conducted at the public expense, the presenting of petitions of this kind, and the conducting of proceedings thereupon at the public expense, would become the uniform course adopted as the most effectual, by parties opposing Private Bills. If the inquiry now sought were to go on, the parties seeking it should pay the expense, and not the public. He regarded this as a mode of action adopted by the opponents of the Bill to stop its further progress.

Sir R. Peel doubted whether the remedy sought for by the petitioners really existed. He also doubted the policy of the House giving permission to parties to prosecute persons presenting petitions to the House; or whether, by giving such permission, the House could constitute the making false allegations in a petition a legal offence. He believed that it had been ruled by competent tribunals, that parties presenting petitions to the House were privileged so to do, without being liable to the consequences now sought to be visited upon the petitioners. His right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that, if they took the course proposed, they would constitute a precedent which would be constantly appealed to in the case of Private Bills; and he was disposed to concur, to a certain extent, in that opinion. At the same time, they must remember that they were now dealing with an offence against the public. There was an allegation made by a party, that if he had a little time he should discover numerous other instances of similar frauds, in addition to those specifically alleged. A party came forward and alleged as a reason why they should not read a certain Bill a third time, that several instances of fraud existed in the subscription list; and that he was prepared to establish that allegation, urging it as a reason why the Bill should not be read a third time. If he could substantiate his allegation, he was perfectly warranted in presenting his petition; but if he could not, and if he had not good reason to believe that what he was urging was true, he had in that case committed a great offence against that House, because the statements which he made might have influenced them in the performance of their legislative functions. It was too much, perhaps, to hold that they were precluded from entering into this inquiry on the score of inconvenience. In the present instance, they had not permitted the allegations made to constitute an impediment to the performance of their legislative duties. They had read the Bill a third time, and so far the parties interested in it were not aggrieved; and the House were now dealing with the question merely as a Parliamentary question. If, therefore, they did not permit the rights of private parties to be affected, but now determined to investigate the matter fully, as a Parliamentary question, such a course could not be an inconvenient one. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Wakley), whenever he found himself in a difficulty, always said that he would leave the matter with him (Sir R. Peel); and he could not see what great public evil could result from instituting the inquiry demanded, particularly if they could get hon. Gentlemen who were ready, like the hon. Member for Lambeth, who would probably be the chairman of the Committee, to sit for forty-eight consecutive hours over their labours. He was quite convinced that the hon. Gentleman did not make the offer of his services under the impression that it would not be accepted. If the Committee were appointed, it might sit to-morrow; and if the inquiry were not immediately completed, it would have the opportunity of reporting to the House that it had made a certain progress, and of recommending that the investigation should be resumed next Session. Not seeing any great evil that was likely to flow from such a course, as a precedent, he for one was disposed to vote for the appointment of a Committee.

Mr. Wakley was glad that he had referred the case pointedly to the right hon. Gentleman, as it turned out that he had made a good selection. The question now was, to what extent the inquiry was to proceed, and what was to be its precise nature.

Lord John Russell agreed with the course recommended by the right hon. Gentleman. He thought the inquiry sought for should be made; and, guarding himself against the presumption that he would in future vote for a similar Motion, unless under similar circumstances, he would support the Motion for the appointment of a Committee.

Sir R. H. Inglis thought that the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, and adopted by the noble Lord, might probably be the wise one, but it was not the course for which the petitioners in the present case prayed.

Committee appointed to examine the allegations of the petitioners.

FIRE AT QUEBEC—MESSAGE FROM HER MAJESTY.] Colonel Dawson Damer appeared at the bar, with a Message from Her Majesty. Upon being called on by the Speaker, he said that Her Majesty had received the Address of that House on the 1st of this month, to which he had been directed to present to the House the following Answer:—

"I have received with much satisfaction your Address, in which you assure Me that you will make good a sum of money to be granted for the relief of the sufferers by the late calamitous Fires at Quebec.

"I have given directions that a sum, not exceeding 20,000*l.* shall be applied for this purpose."

Message laid on the Table.

TRAVELLING ON RAILWAYS.] Viscount Palmerston had a question to ask of the Vice President of the Board of Trade, of which he had given notice. He wished to state his reason why he put this question. He had received a letter from a friend, who had not long ago been a Member of that House, and who, having observed a statement in the papers as to the practice of employing engines at the rear of the train, wrote to him to say that he had observed the same thing on the London and Birmingham Railway. His friend said that he was going down the other day on the fast train—he begged of hon. Gentlemen to remark that—and upon the line from the Weedon station to Birmingham, he observed that they had an engine in the rear, when they were going at a rate, it might be supposed, of from forty to fifty miles an hour. His friend remonstrated against this, but in vain; and in the morning, when he complained at Birmingham, the answer he received was that they were in the constant habit of doing it. If this, then, were the general practice on railways, it seemed to him to be a matter of considerable importance; and it was desirable and essential that it should be put a stop to. The questions, then, that he wished to ask of the hon. Baronet the Vice President of the Board of Trade were, whether the Board of Trade had the power by law to prevent these proceedings; and whether, if they had not the power, the Government would think it right to bring in a Bill—to bring it in now, before this Session was over, giving them some power in this matter? Even still there was time to do this; a Bill might pass through the House of Lords to-morrow and next day, and being brought down to that House on Friday, might pass through all its stages. A Bill of this sort, he said, was required to give security to Her Majesty's subjects.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer: To do it this Session, you must have an engine behind.

Lord Palmerston: It were better that that should for once be done here, in order to secure the placing of the engines before there in future.

Sir G. Clerk replied, that the Board of Trade had no power whatever in the matter to which the noble Lord had referred. All that they had was the power to remonstrate with railway companies, and of pointing out to them any dangerous practices that were known to exist on their lines. And he would take the present opportunity of stating, that whenever the Board of Trade had felt it to be their duty to remonstrate, they had found the utmost readiness, on the part of the various companies, to adopt any suggestion that they might make. The question of having engines placed behind the trains, had attracted the notice of the Board of Trade on several occasions; and in 1841 they addressed a number of queries to all the railroad companies at that time in existence, asking them whether, under any circumstances, additional engines were employed by them, and whether they were placed in front or behind the trains. In answer to those queries, he believed with one or two exceptions only, the Board were informed that it was necessary sometimes from the state of the weather, or accidental circumstances, such as the extraordinary weight of the train, to employ a second engine, but they uniformly employed it in front of the train; and most of the companies admitted that it was extremely objectionable, and highly dangerous, to use an engine behind. At the same time, they stated that there were particular circumstances, as in case of an incline of considerable steepness, which it was found difficult to overcome with the ordinary locomotive power, where it was more convenient to employ an engine behind; because, if it were placed in front for a short distance, in order to surmount the incline, there would be considerable difficulty experienced in detaching the engine, and getting it out of the way of the train, without stopping the train altogether. They added, that where a second engine was employed in a case of that sort, the speed of the train was necessarily very much reduced, and there was no ground for apprehending danger. In the neighbourhood of Liverpool, he understood, there were one or two steep inclines, and that the practice of having a second engine to propel the trains up these inclines, had been adopted without any danger arising. The Board of Trade received a complaint from a gentleman last year, relative to the practice which prevailed on the South Eastern Railway of employing an engine to propel the trains on other parts of the line than the steep gradients. The Board of Trade corresponded with the directors of the South Eastern Company on the subject. They attempted to defend the practice; and the Board signified that it was extremely objectionable, and could only be allowed on steep inclines. He was sorry to hear the statement made by the noble Lord, that upon the London and Birmingham line, the practice had been lately introduced of using a second engine to propel the trains. He presumed, however, that that must have been in the case of the express trains; for, on referring to their answers, taken in 1841, he observed that the directors of the London and Birmingham Railway stated that it was a practice they never had had recourse to. Any Gentleman who went to Euston-square might see two engines employed to take the trains to Camden Town; but those engines were in front, and not behind. The Board of Trade had always said, that it was extremely dangerous, and, therefore, highly objectionable, to place the engines behind; and they had endeavoured, as far as they had power, to prevent it. It might be expedient, if the practice were becoming more general, that Parliament should interfere early in the next Session; but it was utterly impossible to do what the noble Lord proposed, namely, pass a short Bill through its various stages, in both Houses of Parliament, in the present Session. He apprehended that, considering the difference of opinion which prevailed in this House, with regard to investing the Board of Trade with additional powers, any Bill, having that object in view, would give rise to very considerable discussion, and occupy some time in passing through the House. He could assure the noble Lord, that the Board of Trade would devote their best attention to the subject, in order to remedy the evil complained of.

Subject at an end.

Augmentation of Small Livings.] Viscount Clive asked the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether any communication had taken place between the right hon. Baronet and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, as to the formation by them of a scale for augmenting small livings, in which area shall be taken into consideration as well as population; also, when such scale is likely to come into operation, as proposed by the right hon. Baronet during the progress of the Cathedral Churches (Wales) Bill (Act 6 and 7 Vic., c. 77,) through the House of Commons, in the Session of 1843?

Sir J. Graham said, that no written communication had taken place between him and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners upon the subject to which the question referred; but he, being a member of the Commission, did bring the matter under the consideration of the Commissioners. At the present moment, however, on account of the deficiency of funds, all augmentation of small livings by the Commission was suspended. When he (Sir J. Graham) proposed that area as well as population should be taken into consideration with reference to the augmentation of small livings, no positive decision was adopted by the Commissioners, but the proposition was favourably entertained.

Railway Accidents.] Mr. Waddington wished to ask the hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Board of Trade, whether he had received any information relative to the serious accident which yesterday occurred on the Eastern Counties Railway. He understood that the directors had withheld all information upon the subject; but he had visited the spot immediately after the accident took place, and a frightful accident it proved to be. Not only was it attended with the death of a stoker, but another man had his leg broken, and a third he saw led away to the hospital in a most alarming state.

Mr. Ward said, that the hon. Baronet (Sir G. Clerk) could scarcely yet have received the account of the accident at the Board of Trade; and perhaps the House would allow him to state the particulars of the unhappy occurrence. If it were to be ascribed to the causes which he had heard alleged, he did not see how any human foresight or precaution could have averted the consequences. It appeared that the train left London at eleven o'clock yesterday forenoon, and as since the opening of the new line to Cambridge the board of directors had taken the precaution of desiring the superintendent of the locomotive department to go as far as Cambridge with the quick train, to see that the men properly worked the engines, the superintendent was accordingly on the engine yesterday, and was the only one of the survivors who could give an account of the occurrence. He preserved the whole of his recollection, and was under examination to-day. He stated that the engine employed was one of the first class. It was of the very finest quality that could be produced, and had just been brought into work. It was running perfectly steady, at a pace of about twenty-eight miles an hour, and no vibration or oscillation was perceptible, or anything to indicate that there was danger before them. But, upon a sudden, one of the wheels of the engine was struck, apparently by the end of a rail which had risen in consequence of the wedge which fastened it having got loose. At all events the engine was thrown off the line, and ran for upwards of a hundred yards along the ballast, dragging with it the whole train. The superintendent stated that, retaining all his presence of mind, up to a certain period after the engine left the rails, he hoped to stop the train without any fatal result: instead of which, however, on a sudden, the engine turned off across the second line, and ran against a bank. The engine was of enormous power, and the train was a very long one. The nearest carriages to the engine, two second-class carriages, and a horse-box, were at once thrown into a heap, and the engine-driver cast to a considerable distance. When the examination was proceeding to-day, he was not in a fit state to answer any questions, and it appeared that he had no recollection whatever of what had occurred. Some how or other the clothes of the stoker were caught by the engine, and he was thrown under the heap of carriages, and, as it was to be hoped, instantly killed, for the unfortunate man's lower extremities were completely burnt. The superintendent of the locomotive department found himself under this enormous pile of wreck, and within nine inches of the dead man. Having crept from under it, he discovered the carriages burning. The guard, who was sitting on a second-class carriage, had one of his legs broken, and the other materially injured. He was conveyed to the hospital at Cambridge: and it was perfectly providential that not one of the passengers in the long line of carriages which composed the train was injured. Some of the escapes were of the most extraordinary description. There was a woman with an infant in her arms in one of the second class carriages, and both escaped; and, excepting some slight bruises, as he had already observed, no injury whatever had been sustained by the passengers. After the minutest examination with regard to speed and other circumstances, he could not find that anything was done by the servants of the Company which could have occasioned the accident, which he entirely attributed to the circumstance of the rail having risen. The line to Cambridge was opened only a week ago, after inspection by General Pasley, who was so satisfied with it that he said he never saw a line constructed that did greater credit to the promoters. There was every reason to believe that it was as firm, safe, and durable a work as could have been constructed; and he thought that no human foresight or precaution could have prevented the accident. Of course the whole of the circumstances would be investigated by the Board of Trade, to whom the directors had sent an official report this day.

Colonel Sibthorp and Mr. Gregory rose together; but, being reminded by Mr. Speaker that there was no question before the House, they both resumed their seats.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the Order of the Day for the third reading of the Exchequer Bills Bill; upon which,

Colonel Sibthorp said, the question now was whether it was not necessary that the Government should without any delay take some steps for affording compensation to the unfortunate individuals who suffer by accidents on railroads.

Mr. Gregory said, it must be a subject of great congratulation to all persons who travelled by railways, that it was intended to confer further powers on the Board of Trade; but to none could it be a subject of greater congratulation than to those who had had the misfortune to travel on the Eastern Counties Railway, that it was intended to confer powers on that Board to enable it to institute a rigid investigation into the proceedings of that line. He had the honour, at the beginning of this year, to submit to the Board of Trade a memorial, signed by twenty-two Members of that House, and also by Lord Exeter, Lord Stradbroke, and others, complaining of the malpractices on that line. They complained of great and unnecessary delays, of extreme incivility, and of insufficient attendance. They complained to the Company of that delay, and all they received in reply was the time tables of the railway. But he could prove to the House, and the hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon could bear out that statement, that the statistics contained in those tables were totally incorrect. How could it possibly be imagined that there could be safety on a line where the delays were so great—actually a delay of an hour having taken place on a line of thirty miles' length, particularly where, with the insufficient arrangements on that line, the succeeding train might run into that which was delayed?

Mr. Ward hoped the House would feel that he was justified in making a few remarks upon the statement which had been made by the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman was one of a section of gentlemen whom the Company had been most anxious to please, but whom they had been so unfortunate as to displease. The period to which the hon. Gentleman referred, was the Newmarket week; and there was a most unfortunate succession of mishaps—he could call them nothing else. There was every wish to accommodate those gentlemen, but one thing after another went wrong; but, at all events, all that the hon. Gentleman suffered was loss of time, and the hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon was once or twice too late for his dinner. The servants of the Company were bound to make accurate returns of the time at which the trains arrived at the several stations. He hoped that, in future, when the hon. Member who had spoken had occasion to travel by this railway, he would have no reason to complain of their arrangements.

Sir C. Burrell wished to call the attention of the right hon. Baronet the Vice President of the Board of Trade to a report he had heard, that the chief engineer on one of two great competing lines of railway had declared that, if the trains on the other line were propelled at the rate of fifty or sixty miles an hour, the trains on his line should exceed that speed by five miles an hour. If that report were true, he thought it was time the Government possessed some power to restrain such dangerous competition.

Mr. Ewart said, it appeared that in the train to which this accident occurred, the engine was followed by a luggage carriage and by two empty first-class carriages. Those carriages were rent in pieces, while the carriages containing passengers were undamaged. He thought, therefore, that it would be a most prudent regulation to require railway companies to place luggage or empty carriages between the engines and the carriages conveying passengers. This was a subject which, in his opinion, was well worthy the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

Colonel T. Wood thought the number of railway directors should be limited, that the responsibility should rest with them, that they should receive fixed salaries, and that one of them at least should reside upon the railway. He entertained great respect for the talents and character of the hon. Member for Sheffield; but he could not conceive how that hon. Gentleman could find time to attend to the minute details of a railway company, and to the superintendence of arrangements necessary for securing the safety of passengers. The fact was, that though these arrangements were conducted by boards, the whole business was transacted by a secretary, and there was no proper responsibility attaching to any individual. Gentlemen in the position of the hon. Member for Sheffield did not receive such remuneration for their services as directors as would induce them to give proper attention to the arrangements of railways. He thought, therefore, that the number of directors ought to be limited, that their salaries ought to be fixed, and that one of them should be required to reside on the railway premises.

Mr. P. Howard said, that on the Newcastle and Carlisle Railway, if any accident happened to a servant of the Company, they invariably gave some compensation or made some allowance to the sufferer. In the very few cases of fatal accidents which had occurred on that line, the Company had also awarded some compensation to the family of the unfortunate deceased. He trusted the same equitable feeling would induce the Eastern Counties Railway Company to make some allowance to the families of the unfortunate sufferers by the recent accident.

Mr. Ward wished to state, that at the meeting of the Board of Directors that morning, the very first resolution to which they agreed was, that a provision should be made for the widow of the unfortunate man who had been killed, and that every possible attention should be paid to the other sufferers.

Subject at an end.

Union Workhouses (Ireland).] Mr. Hume wished to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman respecting a sum of 46,000*l.*, which had been applied by the Government to defray some of the expenses connected with the erection of Union Workhouses in Ireland. He wished to know whether any portion of that money had been voted by the House, and if not, whether it was intended to be so voted.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he had not the papers connected with the subject before him, and therefore he might be inaccurate in stating details; but he could state generally that the Union Workhouses had been built, not by means of votes of money in Parliament, but the general authority of the Act which had imposed the Poor Law upon Ireland, and which had directed generally that a sum of money should be advanced on Exchequer Bills for the purpose of erecting workhouses in the different parts of Ireland. Those workhouses had been accordingly erected under the direction of the Poor Law Commissioners; and it had afterwards appeared that from the rapidity with which they had been erected, they were in point of fact not worth the total amount which had been charged for them. At last great complaints had been made by the parishes that they were called on to pay a larger amount than that which they had received was equitably worth; and upon their representations the Government had sent an engineer officer to examine into the real state of those workhouses, and in consequence of his report it appeared that certain deductions were to be made from the sums to be paid by particular parishes. These deductions were given in the papers which the hon. Gentleman held in his hands. Power had been given at the same time to remit part of the payments in particular cases, with respect to the advances which had been made.

Mr. Hume said, his question had not been answered by the right hon. Gentleman. The question was, who was to pay that 46,000*l.*? Out of what fund was it to come?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it was advanced by the public—so much as was said to have been charged on the parishes unjustly, and the public would have to pay it.

Mr. Hume said, if the Government had authorized the payment of any money which had not been included in the general stipulation, it was quite illegal.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the money was to be paid in the course of twenty years. But the Government had the power, under the Act which enabled them to make the advance, of remitting those payments which were not justly due by the parishes to which they were charged, and they had exercised that power in the manner he had mentioned.

Mr. Hume considered the matter altogether a violation of the rights of the House of Commons, with regard to the expenditure of the public money.

Tenement Valuation (Ireland).] Sir D. J. Norreys said, he had given notice of his intention to put a question to the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for Ireland, with respect to the valuation for the purposes of assessment in Ireland. He wished to be informed whether that system, which had been denounced as inapplicable to Ireland, was to be persisted in; or whether it was intended to continue the tenement valuation now in progress, in pursuance of the recommendation of a Committee of the House of Commons; or whether, as there appeared to be a difference of opinion on the subject between that House and certain noble Lords in the other House, as to the principle on which that valuation should be conducted, it would not be better to stop the progress of the valuation altogether, until both Houses should be able to concur as to the principle, rather than to continue an expense which might afterwards turn out to be useless?

Sir T. Fremantle much regretted that the Valuation Bill for Ireland had been rejected by the House of Lords; the only consolation, however, which he derived under the circumstances was, that it had been decently interred. It was, no doubt, difficult to devise a principle of valuation which should be applicable to all purposes of local assessment, and be, at the same time, satisfactory to all parties. He had hoped that that object would have been accomplished by the Bill of the present Session, but unfortunately that Bill had failed. He had at present no doubt that he should have to bring the question again under the consideration of Parliament in the ensuing Session; but it would be at present premature to offer any opinion as to the principle upon which the proposed measure should proceed. As far, however, as he could now speak, he should say that his recommendation would be, that, relying on the decision of the Committee of the House of Commons, and recollecting that a Bill embodying that decision had already passed the House of Commons, and had been carried up to the Lords, and was there rejected almost wholly on account of the late period of the Session at which it was sent up, the principle of the Bill of the present Session should be adopted. And with regard to the valuation now in progress, he thought the Government would be justified in giving orders to Mr. Griffiths, that any surveys made in the interim should be as extensive as possible, so as to be applicable to all the purposes it was sought to effect.

Mr. M. J. O'Connell hoped the measure would be brought in at a sufficiently early period of the next Session to give all parties full time to consider it.

Sir D. Norreys inquired whether the new valuation would be on the standard of prices, as regulated by the old Act, or whether it would proceed on the principle of the valuation adopted under the Poor Law Act?

Sir T. Fremantle said, the valuation would be made, in the first instance, on the actual value of the property. If they estimated the value according to the standard of prices, they must still have a preliminary valuation.

Subject at an end.

Postal Communication with Newfoundland.] Mr. Pakington said, a petition had been presented by a noble Friend of his from St. John's, Newfoundland, setting forth the advantages which would result to the inhabitants of that Colony if the Post-office packets, which frequently passed so near as to come within sight of their ports, were required to touch there, for the purpose of conveying their letters to and from England direct. He wished to ask his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies whether any and what steps had been taken on the subject?

Mr. G. W. Hope said, his noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies had, he believed, received for presentation to Her Majesty an Address upon the same subject as the petition which had been presented to that House. The Government had but one object in these matters, to confer as generally as possible the advantages of postal communication; and, upon the receipt of the petition and the Address alluded to, the question of whether the prayer of the inhabitants of the Colony in question, that the packets should call out and home at St. John's could be complied with consistently with due despatch as regarded the other American Colonies, had been referred to the Admiralty and Post-office Departments; and their opinion was, that, though the packets often came within sight of St. John's, to oblige them to call there on all occasions would occasion much delay. In winter, it was obvious such communication would be out of the question; but even in summer, the navigation in the neighbourhood of Newfoundland, owing to the drifting ice, and the dense fogs that often prevailed, was a matter of difficulty, and would involve much uncertainty and delay; and he had no doubt that the Company who held the contract for the conveyance of the mails to North America would object to the packets calling at Newfoundland, as it would materially increase the length of the voyage.

Andover Union.] Mr. B. Osborne remarked, that on a former occasion the hon. Member for Finsbury had drawn the attention of the Government and the House to certain transactions that had occurred in a certain Union House in the county of Hampshire. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Graham) whether he had, as he then promised he would do, instituted any inquiry into the accuracy of the statements which had been made?

Sir J. Graham said, he understood at the time that the Union to which the hon. Member for Finsbury referred was that of Andover, and it was quite true that he undertook that inquiry should be made into the circumstances to which the hon. Gentleman called his attention. In consequence of that promise he had issued a notice to the Poor Law Commissioners on the following morning, requesting them to institute an immediate inquiry. He had not yet received their report, but he hoped to do so before the prorogation; and when he received it, he would lose not a moment in laying it on the Table. He might add, that not only had he directed inquiry to be instituted, but he had asked the question of the Commissioners, whether any information, such as the hon. Member for Finsbury had received, had been communicated to them; and their reply was, that they had never heard of the transactions referred to until they were mentioned by the hon. Member for Finsbury in that House.

The Exchequer Bills (9,024,000*l.*) Bill was then read a third time and passed.

Silk Weavers.] Mr. Greene moved the Third Reading of the Silk Weavers' Bill.

Mr. Hume knew nothing of the object of this Bill, and he believed the House generally was in the same situation. He was not even aware that it had been printed.

Mr. Greene said, in the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for Lincolnshire, who had charge of the measure, he had undertaken to move the third reading. The Bill was one which had come down recently from the House of Lords, and was a counterpart of the measure which had passed some time ago for regulating the working of framework knitters.

Mr. Bright said, it was quite evident that those who had introduced this Bill into Parliament were either ignorant of the subject upon which they sought to legislate, or were pandering to the prejudices of that class who would be affected by the measure. They might depend upon it that the measure would do no good, but would disappoint the silk weavers in the expectations it would excite in their minds. But for the late period of the Session he should oppose it.

Sir J. Graham remarked, that the Frame Work Knitters Bill, upon the model of which he understood the present measure was founded, had received the fullest consideration, and had resulted from the recommendation of a Commission appointed by the Crown, in compliance with an Address of the House of Commons. Though the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bright) thought it would lead to disappointment, he was informed that the workmen who would be affected by it were most anxious for this legislation. The principle was in no way novel; it had existed in regard to the hosiery trade for a long time, and he did not consider that he would have been justified, on the part of the Government, in resisting a wish so generally expressed by those for whose benefit the measure was brought forward.

Sir John Easthope said, that some time ago he had received from several of his constituents a communication requesting him to support the provisions of this Bill. He had occasion to leave town immediately afterwards; but before going away, he informed his hon. Colleague of the contents of that communication. The Bill should receive his support.

Mr. Borthwick said, the Bill had only come down from the House of Lords on the 30th of July, and it now appeared that nobody in that House was responsible for it. It was too much to expect the House, at that late period of the Session, to pass a measure of which they knew nothing. For his part he could not conceive in whose prolific brain the Bill had originated. They had heard from Punch, who had recently become a high authority upon such matters, that there was a certain noble person in another place who went about crying "old laws to mend;" he could only suppose that it had originated with him. He wished to know whether the Board of Trade approved of the measure?

Mr. Greene said, when he took charge of the measure for his hon. Friend the Member for Lincolnshire, he took the precaution of inquiring of his right hon. Friend (Sir G. Clerk) whether the Board of Trade approved of it, and was informed by him that he had read the measure, and that it had his approbation.

Mr. Warburton said, it was not a sufficient reason with him to consent to a measure of which he knew nothing, that the Board of Trade approved of it. He would move that the third reading be deferred till that day three months.

Colonel Rolleston said, the object of the Bill, as he understood, was to protect the working silk weavers against the master manufacturers.

Mr. Hume objected to the issuing of such complex tickets as those contemplated under the measure before the House. He hoped that the Bill would be allowed to stand over.

Mr. Duncan thought the measure a dangerous one. Such a Bill would form a precedent for other measures which would fetter the liberty of trade.

Mr. Villiers objected to the passing of the Bill, coming as it did so late in the Session, and so objectionable as it was in many points.

Mr. Brotherton thought that the Bill should be postponed until next Session. He was of opinion, however, that it contained many admirable propositions.

Sir John Easthope said, that representations had been made to him in favour of the Bill. It had been generally known in the districts principally concerned, that such a measure was pending in Parliament, and he apprehended that no objection had been raised to it, either on the part of the masters or that of the operatives. He had been told that the measure was a sort of compact which would tend to produce a better feeling than that which had previously existed between employers and employed. Whether it might prove a sound remedy for the abuses which prevailed, he did not pretend to say—he might have some doubts upon that point; but he certainly did think, that as no objection had been started by the masters, and as the measure had been held out to the men as one of security for them, that unless any hon. Member were prepared to state that there was any practical objection standing in the way, it would be hard to interfere with the passing of the Bill.

Sir J. Graham suggested that further debate upon the subject should be adjourned until Friday, by which time he would have had an opportunity of consulting his noble Friend the President of the Board of Trade upon the Bill. The effect of the proposed alteration in the law would be to make compulsory that which was optional under the Bill of the hon. Member for Montrose. The feeling of the working classes he understood to be strongly in favour of the Bill.

Amendment withdrawn. Debate adjourned until Friday.

Case of Lieutenant Hollis.] Mr. Bickham Escott moved for copies of all letters and other documents which had passed to and from the Court of Directors of the East India Company, and Lieutenant W. Hollis, and to and from the said Court and the Board of Control, relative to the dismissal of that officer from the East India Company's service. Lieutenant Hollis was dismissed from the East India Company's service in 1841, in consequence of having made use of insulting language to his superior officer. He (Mr. Escott) admitted that the expressions employed were unjustifiable; but he urged that strong provocation had been given by the unwarrantable conduct of the officer insulted, and he hoped that the case would be taken into the merciful consideration of the Court of Directors. He maintained, also, that the court-martial which condemned Lieutenant Hollis was illegally constituted, and read extracts to prove the extenuating circumstances of the case and the irregular constitution of the Court.

Viscount Jocelyn had no objection to the production of the correspondence, believing that it would prove that the Court of Directors had acted with justice, and at the same time with leniency. In 1841, during his voyage in a troop ship to Bombay, Lieutenant Hollis was put under arrest; he broke that arrest, and made use of language to his superior officer utterly subversive of all discipline, and such, indeed, as no one gentleman would use towards another. He was therefore tried, and sentenced to be cashiered; but in consideration of the conduct of his superior officer, he had been recommended to mercy, and the East Company had, in consequence of that recommendation, granted to him a pension of 70*l.* a year, being only 10*l.* below that to which he would have been entitled had he retired upon half-pay, without a stain upon his character.

Motion agreed to.

Business of the Session.] Lord John Russell: I do not think that the Motion of which I have given notice will interpose to prevent the disposal of any public business now remaining for our consideration. I understood from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the Consolidated Fund Bill and some other Bills would be passed at an early period of the evening, and I was perfectly satisfied to postpone my observations until a later period. These measures having been passed, I will take this opportunity—one of the last we shall have this Session—of considering in what way we have performed the duties we were called on to perform by Her Majesty in Her Speech delivered at the commencement of the Session. And in so doing, I shall refer to those subjects rather with the view to measure the progress we have made—to point out the defects that are to be found in those measures, and to ask the House to consider the prospect before them—than with the view contemplated on another occasion, and in another place, of proving the Ministers of the Crown to be incompetent to the functions which they have to perform. Whether that be so or not, it is not my present purpose to inquire. If, however, it were my purpose to imitate the practice to which I have referred—if it were my purpose to found a charge of incompetency on the fact that measures were delayed until a late period of the Session, and only sent from one House to the other in the month of July, when there was not time deliberately to consider them; and that many measures brought forward at an early period of the Session were given up at the end; I think ample materials could be found in the course pursued by Gentlemen opposite, for enforcing such topics on the attention of the House. One Bill alone, the Bill of the right hon. Secretary for the Home Department — I mean the Physic and Surgery Bill—would form the subject for lengthened comment of this description. The right hon. Gentleman was accustomed to lay great blame on me for bringing forward a measure on the Poor Laws of a complicated nature, and afterwards making Amendments in it, in compliance with the suggestions of Members of this House. It is not the custom of the present Government to listen to objections made in this House—at least not frequently—but they have the custom of altering from time to time their measures, owing to the suggestions which some particular classes of the community make. Thus, with regard to the measure I have just referred to: first, the Council of the College of Surgeons was implicitly to be relied on; then the general practitioners were to be looked to, and their suggestions complied with; then, from the objections of the physicians and surgeons, it was altered again, and though put in so many different shapes, each one was found unsatisfactory to some large class of the profession. I think I have said enough, if I were to imitate the language that was used with respect to me—if I were to place on such a foundation the charge of incompetency for the functions of legislation—that that Bill alone would afford me a sufficient opportunity of making such an attack. But, Sir, I acknowledge there is another question, far more important than the exact mode of legislation carried on as to a number of detailed measures; and that is the question for our consideration, how the great interests of the country are affected by the measures brought before this House, and in what position the country now stands in consequence of them. In reviewing those subjects, I will take the measures in the order observed in the Queen's Speech from the Throne, at the beginning of the Session. The Queen's Speech began by alluding to what will form a very small part of my present remarks—namely, the state of our Foreign Affairs. I rejoice to say that we are not now, as we were at the close of the last Session, looking anxiously to the settlement of differences with France, which threatened a rupture of our amicable relations with that country. I am happy to find our friendly relations so close and unbroken, and that there is every prospect of the continuance of peace between these two great and enlightened countries. Sir, there is a question, however, to which, though I do not mean to enter on it in detail, I cannot help adverting for a moment or two—I mean the question pending between this country and the United States of America. I wish, without at all desiring to interfere with the discretion of the Executive Government, or at all dictating to them as to the course they may think fit to pursue for the settlement of the question of the Oregon Boundary—I wish still to say that those opinions which I gave this House at another period of the Session, of the justice of our claims, are entirely unshaken by anything I have heard or read since on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, on that occasion, said the Government of this country were prepared to maintain our rights. I do not question that assurance. I do not propose to ask him any explanation of the mode in which he proposes to maintain these rights. I am glad to see—regretting as I do the loss of that distinguished and enlightened man who is now the Minister of the United States in this country—I am rejoiced to see a person, who was here many years ago, and who made himself universally respected and esteemed in the society of this country, has been appointed to replace Mr. Everett. I trust that, with fairness and moderation in the discussion of these questions between the two Governments, without any loss of honour or sacrifice of substantial interests, the negociations will be brought to a friendly and amicable conclusion. With these few words (and I am glad they should be so few), I leave the subject of foreign policy; and I come, at once, to what has been done in the course of the Session with respect to our domestic concerns. My opinion on this subject is—not that we should be altogether disappointed at the result of the Session—not that much was not done that affords good prospect for the future; but that while, on the one hand, we may congratulate ourselves on the progress made—especially on the statement of opinions—on the other, much has been left unsettled, much that is of principle left unasserted, and much of a practical nature that remains for us to accomplish, if we really wish to serve the interests of the country by our legislation. Now, Sir, I will take, in the first instance, that question pressed so often on the attention of this House, which I imagine will be again pressed on it next Session, and perhaps for many future Sessions—I mean the anxious subject of Ireland. Sir, in adverting to that subject, I cannot but, in the first place, rejoice that those opinions which were held by Gentlemen who sat opposite some years ago, have been in a great degree abandoned; that even the language held by one of the principal Ministers of the Crown since he came into office has been retracted; and that, therefore, so far as renouncing former erroneous opinions, and being ready to enter on a new course, I have reason to congratulate the House on what has taken place on this subject. It will not be forgotten, that many years ago, when the Government of Lord Grey was divided on the subject, not only did those who were opposed to us resist the Appropriation Clause (which, as I still think, would have been at that time a fair and moderate compromise on the subject of the Church of Ireland)—not only did they oppose that Appropriation Clause (which I do not say was unnatural with their views of Church property and Church establishments)—but they likewise denied to the Irish the rights which the English and Scotch had obtained, with regard to popular election in municipal corporations. Sir, a Gentleman who then filled a distinguished situation in Government, and who was afterwards raised to a still higher station on the Bench of Ireland, and whose death we have had unfortunately since to deplore—I mean Chief Baron Woulfe—expressed very logically the reasons why he thought those privileges should be accorded, and very feelingly the degradation which would be inflicted on our Irish fellow subjects if they should be withheld. He said, he thought it a matter of right, that if those who belonged to England and Scotland obtained the power of popular election in corporations, Ireland should have it likewise; and that it would require the strongest reasons of necessity to justify us in refusing those rights. He stated further, that if they were refused, it could only be done on the ground that the Irish Catholics were unworthy to be members of a free community, and were only fit subjects for a despotism. Sir, I do not think he represented more strongly than the justice of the case required, the feelings of indignation which the rejection of such measures as those I have referred to were likely to cause. And yet the rejection of equal corporate rights was the object of a great party move by the Gentlemen opposite, with the honourable exception of Earl St. Germans, and two or three others. There were other matters with regard to Ireland which then came into question; on every one of which it happened that those opposed to us were inclined to raise in this country both national prejudices and religious convictions, to assist them against the claims of the people of Ireland. Sir, that course of policy, since they came into office, they have, at first doubtfully and silently, but at last explicitly, abandoned. It is now admitted that Ireland ought to have equal rights; it is now admitted, that, in point of principle, as to the rights of voting for Members of this House, or for Members of municipal corporations, they ought to have the same rights as the people of England and Scotland. This, so far as principle is concerned, is a great progress. But let us examine a little how far their measures have been consonant to their professions, and what they have effected for the great object of reconciling the feelings of the people of Ireland to those of the people of England, and inducing them to join in sympathy for defence against a foreign enemy, and in mutual harmony and good will in their domestic concerns, as becomes the people of one united kingdom. Sir, on this subject it is hardly possible to use an expression too strong to convey an idea of what they professed themselves ready to do. Well, with regard to municipal rights, with regard to the rights of election as to Members to serve in Parliament, what Bill have they introduced? It is notorious that the number of electors in the counties in Ireland, from the strict interpretation of the present law, have been in a great degree, and gradually, diminished. That is a grievance which requires the attention of Parliament. The attention of Parliament, however, has not been called to it. With respect to another subject on which they proposed to legislate, and on which they made a very elaborate inquiry, no legislative measures have been introduced. I allude to the subject of the relations between landlord and tenant. It was my opinion, that the issuing of the Commission of Inquiry into the relations between landlord and tenant might be a wise measure; but I was not enabled to say positively it was so, until I should see the result at which that Commission arrived. It was evident that very considerable evils must attend the issuing of that Commission. It tended, in the first place, to raise great hopes amongst the tenantry —amongst the poorer and more ignorant class especially—it tended to make them believe that some great measure was at hand; that a comprehensive and efficient remedy would be applied for the relief of their misery, to supply the want of food and shelter, as well as put an end to the want of security of tenure, which they felt to be one of the greatest hardships they suffered. That was an evil inseparable from the issuing of the Commission. In the next place it was very likely, unless conducted with great care, to excite in the country considerable animosity on the part of the tenants against the landlords, from the former thinking they had the Government taking their part as against the landlords, who were looked on by the Government as tyrannical. In this respect the effect must have been far greater than that produced by the phrase which I heard some of those opposite condemn very strongly, which I think was a very proper phrase, and which was used by my late respected and ever to be lamented friend, Mr. Drummond, that "property had its duties as well as its rights." But the evils accompanying the issuing of the Commission might be remedied, if the Government, in issuing it, had a clear perception of the remedy which they wished to introduce, and only desired to frame its details by the additional knowledge they would acquire from the evidence taken before a Commission. I supposed, therefore, that some such remedy was in the contemplation of the Government. But, Sir, it appears I was totally mistaken in that supposition. It appears that there has been brought forward, as the result of that Commission, a Bill, which I must say was one of the most extraordinary measures ever brought under the consideration of the Legislature. It was a plan for the appointment of a Government Commission to interpose between landlord and tenant with regard to any transactions that might take place for the improvement of the land. How any practical man could have thought such a remedy at all suitable to the affairs of Ireland, I own I am at a loss to imagine. That Bill never arrived at this House. I suppose the universal outcry made by Irishmen of all classes and politics led to the abandonment of that Bill. Well then, Sir, what farther measures have they proposed? They have proposed a Bill for the endowment of the College of Maynooth, and a Bill for establishing of academical education, pointed to by Her Majesty in the Speech from the Throne. I do not wish to go over the arguments on these subjects. I think the endowment of Maynooth was made on a good plan; but I think the observation made with respect to it by a gentleman who has written very ably on the subject of Ireland perfectly just. He says there are two objections made to the endowment of Maynooth; one is, that the sum is so trifling that it is hardly worth the acceptance of the Irish; and the other is, that it would lead to the endowment generally of the Roman Catholic clergy; and this gentleman's answer is, "I think the first objection answered by admitting the value of the second, namely, by admitting that this grant will lead to the endowment of the Roman Catholic clergy." Now, at least, it would be an intelligible line of policy (without discussing whether it is right to endow the Roman Catholic priesthood) to introduce this measure to which the Roman Catholic prelates gave their consent, as the foundation of that still larger endowment to which it has been said the prelates would not consent. But the Members of the Government, one after another, explicitly declared that it was not their intention to follow up this measure by another such as I have hinted at; that such a measure might, in course of time, follow it, but that, at all events, the measure they introduced was a measure entirely by itself. Thus it is obvious they have raised a very great clamour in this country. They have excited, beyond any immediate clamour, a very deep feeling. If they do not mean to proceed farther—if they have not some measure in contemplation for another Session—I say they were unwise to provoke such resistance. Now, with regard to the other measure of academical education, it happens that, on this subject, as on many others, although Ministers refused to listen to the counsel of this House, they did take counsel from others out of doors, and answered the demands made on them by a certain portion of the people, as to a question in which the latter felt an interest. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, told us—what I was very sorry to hear, on the subject of Maynooth—that his object was very much to break the confederacy that existed in Ireland for the purpose of promoting Repeal, and to divide the Roman Catholics, by proposing the Bill as a satisfaction to one portion of the Roman Catholic population. Well, then, it does appear from this that the Repeal Association (as was justly said by the principal member of it) was the chief cause of the introduction of this measure; that it was not founded on justice, or adopted with the view of affording an improved education to the Roman Catholic priests, but was yielded to the clamour of the Repeal Association, supported by the increasing multitudes which the Association collected. Well, that Bill, in its course through this House, produced a great excitement in England, and that excitement was chiefly caused by those who are opposed, not only to Maynooth, but to all ecclesiastical endowments — those who maintain that we are here to regulate secular questions alone, and that all religious instruction, in chapel or school, should be given on the principle of voluntary support. Such being the case, the Ministers introduced their next measure on that principle; and all the arguments stated by the right hon. Secretary of State for the Home Department in favour of his academical measure, were arguments repeatedly urged by some Members in this House, and very forcibly maintained by persons out of this House, against any State support of religious instruction whatever. But, Sir, above all, I would wish to impress on the House that these measures are late and are imperfect. In the first place, I maintain they are late; and I think that a great lesson is to be learned from the mode in which the party opposite, in Government and in opposition, have treated the claims of the Roman Catholics of Ireland. Many years ago, when the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, was, I believe, a Member of this House, and was, if I am not mistaken, Secretary for Ireland, Mr. Grattan said, more than once, that if the Roman Catholic claims were allowed, he had sufficient authority from the prelates to state, that no Roman Catholic bishop would be appointed to whom the Crown objected. That would have been a great concession to the Crown of this country, and it would have enabled the Crown to refuse its sanction to the nomination of any prelate likely to use his religious authority for seditious agitation. That offer was rejected, and the Roman Catholic claims were refused. In 1825, another proposition was made by a noble Lord, still a Member of this House, that provision should be made by law for the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland. The House agreed to that Resolution; but the Government of the day refused to concede the Roman Catholic claims, and that proposition fell to the ground. If you had agreed in 1813, or in the other years that Mr. Grattan made the proposal of conceding the Roman Catholic claims, you would have had the security of the nomination by the Crown of the Roman Catholic bishops. If you had agreed to Emancipation in 1825, you would have had the security—and a great one I consider it—of an endowment of the priests provided by the State, they no longer depending on voluntary support. You lost the opportunity for these measures. You granted Roman Catholic Emancipation at last, because you chose it as the alternative instead of civil war. You did not found it on justice and large policy, but you chose it as the least of two great evils. Such was your want of foresight, such your improvidence with regard to the past Now, with respect to the present—let us look to another measure I have already mentioned, namely, that for giving the people of the towns of Ireland an equality of municipal privileges with those of England. In 1836, it will be remembered, the King of this country, by the advice of his Ministers, stated that he hoped Parliament would agree to the reform of the municipal corporations of Ireland, founded on the same principles as the measures adopted as to England and Scotland. For my own part, I thought the assurance so general that it would be adopted by the whole House. I was disappointed; for I found the strongest opposition was raised to a concession of that kind. The question, then, was, whether or not you would grant equal rights to Ireland: and let those who have attended for the last two years to the speeches of Mr. O'Connell, hear the language which he then used, if Parliament was ready to grant terms of equality to his country. Mr. O'Connell said—

"He had met congregated thousands in Ireland, and asked them, would they give up Repeal if he could get justice? He was met by a unanimous shout, 'Get us justice from England, and never think of Repeal more.' He came with that announcement to the British Legislature. He announced it with no affectation of humility—he did not represent any town, city, or borough—he represented millions, and had the confidence of millions. Do justice to Ireland, and England had nothing to apprehend from the further agitation of Repeal, nothing to apprehend from Ireland, but everything to hope. Henceforth separation was at an end. Do them justice, and they were ready to become a party to the Empire. Refuse it at your peril."

At a subsequent part of his speech he said—

"What was it that the Irish people wanted? Simply to become a part of England. True, they had sighed and struggled to procure a domestic legislature, and perhaps to that object might be still directed the aspirations of his own heart. But he and they were ready to give it up. He called upon the House to witness that they were ready to abandon the Repeal for ever upon one condition, and one only—that of being placed upon perfect equality with England and Scotland."

He then said, if that were not agreed to, they were resolved to do justice to themselves. Now, just consider what would have been your position had you agreed to those terms, and said, "We give you perfect equality, we will close with your proposal, we will give you what Mr. Pitt declared you should have and had a right to." Would you not have placed a great bar in the way of the further agitation of Repeal? Could Mr. O'Connell, after you had complied with these conditions, fairly again have raised that cry, which has inflamed millions, for a Repeal of the Union, and a separate legislature for Ireland? But, Sir, hon. Gentlemen opposite were again late. Not this House, but the House of Lords, in which their party had a majority, refused that measure, and others, which would tend to place the people of Ireland on an equality with the people of England. Well then, Sir, I ask, (having refused measures for the settlement of the ecclesiastical question in 1825, and Parliament having in 1836 refused civil equality,) do we find now, when Ministers are willing to propose, so far as political rights are concerned, perfect equality, the same answer as to a readiness to give up Repeal, which I have already read to you? Do we hear it now said, "Give us equal privileges, and Repeal is at an end?" Not a word of the kind. They tell us that no measures you can propose will have the effect of inducing them to give up the demand for Repeal. Without imputing to those opposite any improper motives for their conduct in 1836, I must say it was most shortsighted and totally wanting in wisdom, and that if the conciliation of Ireland is not effected, it is to be attributed to the delay and the refusal so long persisted in, to remedy the evils of which Ireland complained. Next, Sir, with regard to the ecclesiastical question. You refused the compromise proposed by the Appropriation Clause. You now hear the Church Question discussed as at the bottom of the evils of Ireland, by those who have considered the question of Irish Government on one side or the other. Many Gentlemen, not connected with party, have discussed this question. I have mentioned the able author of "Ireland, Past and Present," on the one hand; and on the other, amongst the opponents to Maynooth, I may name the distinguished author of one of the pamphlets recently published, the Rev. Baptist Noel; they both agree that it is most unjust to refuse Ireland equality. One party says the way to effect that object is to endow the Roman Catholic Church, and to place it on equal terms with the present Establishment. Mr. Baptist Noel says, and those who think with him say, they would never consent to such an endowment, and that it would not only be unwise, but a violation of what is due to the conscientious conviction of Protestants. What he proposes is the total abolition of the present Church Establishment of Ireland. Now, depend on it, that Government, however constituted, will be forced sooner or later to adopt one of these alternatives. It is impossible that they can refrain altogether from a settlement of the question in one way or the other. There are difficulties in the way of both. I have stated in the House before now on what general principle I should act. If I were to attempt to carry into effect that view, I know I should excite great opposition amongst a considerable party in England. If you attempted the destruction of the Church of Ireland, you are aware of the difficulties you would be met with, the feelings you would have to shock, and the principles to which you would have to run counter. But every man who has looked at all impartially at the subject of Ireland, every Englishman who has looked to the settlement of the Irish question, has agreed in this—that either on the one principle or on the other, the future policy of the country must be conducted. It is for these reasons, I say, that the Government, in bringing this question before us in a partial way—in submitting one measure of an excellent description, and to which I gave my best support, and another measure of a doubtful character—ought to have been prepared with ulterior measures, and that if they thought it right to go no farther in the present Session, they should not be unprepared with a remedy in a future Session; for, depend on it, unless you determine to settle this great question, the mind of Ireland will continue to be agitated. And how will it be agitated? We had formerly great parties discontented with the Government. In 1834, there was a great meeting at Hillsborough to declare their dissatisfaction with the existing Government. Great numbers of Protestants declared their dissatisfaction with the Governments of Lords Normanby and Fortescue. During the present Government millions have assembled, and with the greatest enthusiasm in their cause, declared their adherence to the opinions of the Repeal Association, and cheered with shouts of delight any taunt or invective, not only against the Government, but against the people of England. But we have now arrived at this result, that neither the one party nor the other are content. While we have assemblages on the one side presided over by Mr. O'Connell, we are threatened on the other with immense Protestant meetings, to declare their dissatisfaction and discontent with the present state of things. Let the Government rely upon it, it will not do to allow this general discontent to continue. It is not only disgraceful to them as a Government—it puts in peril the whole United Kingdom. Let them recollect that the phrase of the right hon. Gentleman, when he spoke of sending a message of peace to Ireland, was no idle phrase; that the force of discontent will not be allayed, until you take some large principle, until you act upon it consistently, and declare that to that principle you are determined to adhere, and that whether it goes to diminish the Established Church, or to raise up the Roman Catholic body, you are resolved to do what is just, and will take all the consequences that shall follow. My advice in this House was, that first you should take all the civil and political questions—that before you attempted to settle the religious questions, you should give civil and political equality to the Irish. My advice was not taken; the question of civil and political equality has been this Session entirely postponed, and other minor measures have been introduced; but still I think that would be the right course, and that you cannot expect the Roman Catholic prelates to be ready to enter into any arrangement before they are enabled to say, "We are not betraying any right of our lay fellow countrymen—they have every right that Englishmen have, and we are now only treating with respect to a subject in which we have no separate interest from the rest of our countrymen." This, therefore, is the conclusion which I draw from your measures with respect to Ireland. You have done well in abandoning all your former declarations—you have done well in withdrawing your opposition to measures which you formerly denounced and frustrated—but in not adopting some clear and large line of policy, your course has been defective, and it is well worth your while to consider in what manner you can amend those errors. I need not allude to various measures particularized in the Queen's Speech, which have not been introduced. There is that measure, with regard to which the Queen declared that it would be highly gratifying to Her if we would legislate—namely, that which was framed with the view of promoting the health and comfort of the poorer classes of Her subjects. On that important subject legislation has not been carried into effect; and, indeed, hardly a single stage of any measure on the subject has been moved. But I come to another subject, with respect to which I must likewise say that there is a good deal that is gratifying, while there is still much remaining to disappoint the expectations that may have been formed. I allude to the measures that were proposed to us by the Queen's Government, in consequence of the Speech from the Throne, with respect to the finances and trade of the country. I was not one of those who thought that an income tax was rendered necessary by the deficiency of the Revenue to meet the public expenses. But this I was always ready to say, from the commencement, and I am more persuaded of it this year, that if an income tax was to be imposed, the right hon. Gentleman took a wise and comprehensive view of the interests of the State, when he combined the imposition of an income tax with measures to relieve the industrious classes from many of the taxes which pressed most heavily upon them, and liberate trade from many of its restrictions. With respect to this subject, certainly, the Government have more than fulfilled any expectations that we on this side could have formed. They have not fulfilled the expectations of those who thought they came in as a Government pledged to the maintenance of protection to native agriculture and industry; all those expectations of a great body of their supporters have been entirely disappointed. They have, on the contrary, clearly declared their adherence to those sound principles which all the greatest writers on those subjects have propounded, and which the greatest practical statesmen who have attended to them have acted upon. So far, therefore, as their measures and declarations go on some of these subjects, I think they have been benefactors to the country. But there are three subjects on which the Government of 1841 proposed to legislate, upon which their legislation falls far short not only of completely free trade, but even of that system of approach to free trade, by reduction of duties, of which Mr. Huskisson was the advocate. With respect to timber, for instance, they have left the great differential duties of 25*s.* on foreign timber, and 1*s.* on colonial. With respect to another article, that of sugar, they have adhered most unfortunately to the Resolution of 1841, and have kept on a prohibitory duty against the produce of certain foreign nations. Sir, we have urged that subject over and over again; but facts much stronger than any arguments we can use, have since confirmed our views upon this subject. We have had this year a proposition by Spain to carry into effect the Treaty of Utrecht, made in 1713. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newark, argued for two hours and a half to show that that Treaty was not in force. The greater part of his argument, I think, was founded on points which had nothing to do with the demand of the Spanish Minister—on which the Spanish Minister did not rest any part of his case, or upon facts which, if rightly looked into and examined, did not bear out his conclusions. But even supposing that all his conclusions had been right, and that the proposal of Spain in truth amounted to this—"We offer to make a Treaty now which shall be similar to that which we think was concluded between the two nations in 1713;"—I say all the dictates of wisdom should have induced you immediately to close with that offer. You should have said, "We will not argue with you. We will not go back to what James II. did in violation of his faith on this subject, as he violated his faith upon every other. We will not go back to what we did in the last century, or attempt to show that one party or the other did not conform to the letter of the Treaty; but we will form a convention now in plain, clear, terms, similar to those stipulations we have with many other Powers of Europe, by which we shall agree that Spain and England shall treat each other commercially on the footing of the most favoured nations." I think that is the only sort of commercial Treaty that is eligible—I do not allude, of course, to the Treaties of navigation—the only one that is worth having with any foreign nation—that you should not have differential duties imposed against your produce in comparison with any foreign nation. I am persuaded, if you have those terms, you need not be afraid of entering into competition on an equal footing with any of the foreign nations which may be your rivals. But your wretched policy of 1841, of placing a moral tariff on sugar, drives you to find every sort of far-fetched and fine-spun argument, by which you may defeat advantageous proposals similar to that of Spain, and injure the best interests of the country. And how stands the case as to Brazil? The right hon. Gentleman has not heard officially of the proposal to lay on 20 per cent. of the duties on foreign produce additionally, as against English produce and manufactures. At the same time, the merchants have an entire belief that such is the intention, and that there is an ordinance prepared, if not issued, to impose those additional duties on the produce of England. Be that as it may, however, it is clear that on the subject of sugar, then, you have not carried into effect anything like a system of free trade. You preserve a duty, avowedly prohibitory, for the sake, as you say, of discouraging the Slave Trade, and distinguishing the consumption of slave-grown produce, but which, I believe, has not in the least degree that effect. That determination puts you on a footing of commercial enmity with Spain and Brazil, injuring the sale of the manufactures of this country, and endeavouring to carry into effect a prohibition which, I think, it is quite plain that in the end any statesman having the conduct of affairs of this country will find to be both unwise and impracticable. Thus, both on timber and sugar, you retain large differential duties. What have you done as to corn? With respect to corn, likewise, it was supposed that the Gentlemen opposite, having resisted in a body the Motion to go into a Committee on the Corn Laws in 1839 and 1840, were strongly in favour of protective duties, and even of the special law of 1828, as affecting the importation of corn. Yet although nine-tenths of the country were persuaded that that was the intention of the party opposite, their words at least have been very much better than were their then professions. After the elections of 1841 had been finished—after the adherents of the present Ministry had been chosen, either without a contest or by triumphant majorities, in order to support a new Government, which the farmers and the agricultural interest believed would firmly stand by the Act of 1828—a new law has been introduced, lesser restrictions have been imposed on the importation of corn, and their course in this respect has been altered. It has not only been altered with respect to the letter of the Act of Parliament; the security of protection has been shaken by the language which has been held by the Ministers of the Crown. They have held language quite inconsistent with the maintenance of their own Act, and the assurances then given to the agricultural interest of the maintenance of their laws have been like the sliding scale itself; as the duty sinks from 20*s.* to 1*s.* so have these assurances become—

"Small by degrees, and beautifully less."

So that in the present year there is far less security for the maintenance of the Corn Laws, than there has been in any previous year. We had a confession from the Secretary of State for the Home Department that the sliding scale by itself would cause considerable evils, and that it was necessary to prop it up by a fixed duty levied upon some part of the corn that would come in; and that as corn from Canada might be obtained under a fixed duty in May, June, or July, when the corn from the Continent was kept back waiting for a diminution of the duty, it was necessary to have a Canada Corn Act, in order to make the sliding scale bearable. Now, this is a confession of the total imperfection of the sliding scale—this is a confession that the sliding scale by itself would not answer its purpose, and that you are obliged to prop it up by the Canada Corn Act, framed on a principle totally different. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury took away another argument for the sliding scale, on which the advocates of protection have always relied namely, that the labouring classes would be losers by the admission of foreign corn; because when bread was cheap, the wages of labour would be very much diminished. The right hon. Gentleman declared his belief was, that such would not be the case, and that the low price of bread and provisions was an advantage to the labouring classes. That which he thus stated to be his belief, was proved in detail by the right hon. Gentleman who sits near him, who showed that during the years of cheap corn you had not only had more comforts and better wages for the labouring classes, but you had, in consequence, less crime and diminished immorality. It is obvious, the case of the present Corn Law is greatly weakened by these admissions; but let us look to the foundation on which it has now to rest. Can any one have heard what has been passing within the last ten days without feeling the misery of an uncertain law for the import of corn? Can any body feel that there is a doubt whether the next fortnight will bring us a tolerably good harvest, or one miserably deficient, and not wish that the labouring classes of this country should be provided with food from all quarters from which it can be obtained? I maintain that it is the duty of this House to provide for such a contingency; but what is it you do? I admit that, whether you have a small fixed duty or a completely free trade in corn, it must always be matter of deep anxiety whether the harvest should turn out to be favourable or unfavourable. That if there were now at this present moment a completely free trade in corn, and you were in doubt whether the harvest would turn out an abundant or a very short one, it would be impossible there should not be a very considerable amount of speculation; it would be impossible there should not be a rise in the price of corn, and fluctuations in the price to a considerable extent, dangerous with respect to the currency as well as the sustenance and welfare of the people. That I admit; but then that is a consequence for which the Legislature would not be responsible. I maintain, if you had either a fixed duty or a free trade, you would be sure of such supplies coming in as could be obtained. I think a fixed duty in such a case would only diminish the price at which the merchant abroad would sell the corn. But at all events, according to such a system, your legislation would be certain and uniform. There would be no doubt nor contingency as to the duty at which the corn would be admitted; but as the matter at present stands, there being the uncertainty of the seasons, there being the uncertainty of foreign supplies, you superadd, by your legislative wisdom, the artificial uncertainty whether a few weeks hence the duty will be 20*s.* or 1*s.* You thereby double the amount of speculation—you double the hazard to which the people of this country are exposed—you double the gambling in this article of necessary sustenance for human life. Then, Sir, is it wise to continue such a law—it is wise for a Ministry, who profess free trade, for a Prime Minister who makes it his boast that he has done more for free trade than any other Minister for a very long period of years — it is wise for him to rest upon a law which he must own to be so defective with respect, not only to all the principles of political economy, but all the other principles on which commercial transactions are usually based?—and then, to add to this uncertainty, we have Gentlemen continually avowing that they do not think the law will be permanent. We had only the other day a gentleman (Mr. Sotheron, North Wiltshire), who has been always a constant supporter, not only of the present Ministry generally, but especially of their policy as to the Corn Law and the sliding scale, avowing publicly that he did not think this law would last, and that two years would probably see the end of it. Why, when people hear that language used by a supporter of the Government, not one of those ultra-protectionists opposed to the right hon. Baronet, who might in a moment of discontent say, that he did not believe the Minister would support the Corn Laws, but one of their steady supporters, what can the farmers think but that it is a settled point that this law shall be abandoned? Well, then, I say, if it is to be abandoned, do not leave the country in this miserable uncertainty. Begin your next Session soon, begin it early, and begin it with a reconsideration of the Corn Laws. The farmers themselves must feel, even if they desire to have a large protection against the admission of foreign corn, and to have high prices kept up, that it is anything but desirable to have to treat with their landlords on the supposition that there is to be such a law, and then to find two years afterwards that there is no longer any such system, and that the whole is swept away. However much your proceedings may suit the political interests of parties, it can never suit the interests of the farmers. They cannot but wish to have something certain; and I am quite satisfied the most enlightened of them would much rather even see any evils that might fall on the country, by the sudden adoption of the measure proposed by my hon. Friend behind me, the Member for Wolverhampton, than be kept in this state of uncertainty, having doctrines preached to them that go to the destruction of the present system of Corn Laws, and yet have the Corn Law kept up, as an apparent protection, without any security that it may last another year. I contend, therefore, that while you have done much to make an approach to a system of free trade, still on the great articles of consumption, timber, sugar, and, above all, corn, you are keeping up restrictions contrary to every sound principle, and which it is impossible, if you believe your own theories, that you can mean to uphold. At this very moment, with respect to corn, the stock for the supply of the country is unusually small; I shall move, therefore, for an account of the quantity that is now in bond—it is unusually small in consequence of your own law. And let it not be forgotten, when Gentlemen refer, as I have seen them sometimes do, with great satisfaction, to the failure of speculations in the foreign corn trade, that the consequences of a failure in those speculations are very often injurious not only to those immediately engaged in them, but to the whole country, manufacturers, commercial men, and agriculturists; that the indisposition to get together a supply, and lay up a store of corn on which the country can rely in case of a sudden failure of the harvest, is a national misfortune; that a law that tends to make the trade gambling and uncertain, is a loss to the agricultural interest as well as to all others, and that no law based upon such principles can be for the present or permanent advantage of the country. Sir, there is another subject upon which I wish to touch, as connected with the present Session, although no practical measures have been introduced with regard to it; because it fulfils two conditions which I have showed to be applicable to other subjects—that the Gentlemen opposite have taken a very different tone from that which they formerly took, and therefore great progress has been made in liberality, while, at the same time, much remains to be done. I confess that when I held office there were two subjects that gave me peculiar solicitude, and upon which I was anxious to carry some measures that might be of permanent advantage to the country. One subject was that of Ireland, upon which, immediately after the Reform Act passed, I looked as one on which legislation might now take a better course, and provide for the happiness of the people of that country. The other was the subject of education in England. I will not allude to any particular county, seeing an hon. Baronet opposite who was very much discomposed by a quotation which I made from the Gaol Reports with respect to his own county; but I will allude generally to the fact which appears by all the Gaol Reports, that there is a great proportion of the humbler classes of the people of this country to whom, in early youth, no instruction is imparted in the simplest rudiments of religion; that the name of God, the name of Jesus Christ even, are unknown to them from their youth; that no instruction is afforded to them by which they may guide their path through life, or may look to happiness hereafter; that the first information they receive upon these subjects is when they are sent to a gaol to satisfy the justice of the laws which they have infringed, and when they meet for the first time, in the person of the chaplain of the prison, with a religious instructor, who opens their minds to the divine truths of the Christian Revelation, and who points out to them the religious and moral duties which they ought to have performed, but of which they have never been aware. I have always considered this, so long as it has been brought before me, as a most melancholy fact, which, professing as we do that ours is a Christian country, is disgraceful to ourselves, its legislators. On looking at all the later Returns, I find but a confirmation of that which I observed many years ago. I was once struck by the case of a boy who was imprisoned for ensnaring a hare; the chaplain had examined him to know what his religious instruction was; he had received none whatever; he had never heard the name of Almighty God, and had never gone to a church, having been employed during Sundays by the farmer for whom he worked, along with the other farm servants, in cleaning the horses in the stable. I find, looking at some of the later Reports made by order of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that a clergyman in one of the western counties stated, it was their custom that boys employed by farmers were not sent to school, but were kept in the stables on Sundays; and, therefore, were neither taught to read the Bible nor had any opportunity of attending the instructions of a clergyman, and the performance of divine service. It appeared to me, Sir, that we ought to make some further effort for the reduction of this amount of lamentable ignorance, and for the improvement of those unhappy subjects of our laws, before they become the inmates of a prison. It appeared to the late Government that we could do nothing more useful than to establish a Committee of Privy Council, which should superintend generally the distribution of grants of the public money intended to promote education, and which should likewise have the control of a normal school that was then proposed to be founded. Great objections were popularly stated to this normal school, chiefly, I believe, because the Roman Catholic children were to be allowed to read the Bible in their own version, and that part of the scheme was abandoned in the hope that the remainder might be successfully carried into effect. But I never knew more fierce invectives, more virulent attacks, than were directed against the Government of that day, for the attempt which they thus humbly made to diminish the existing appalling amount of ignorance. When we said there were numbers of the humbler classes who were deplorably ignorant, who had no knowledge of religion, we were told of the dangers of Popery, of Socinianism, of latitudinarianism. The country was excited to opposition. ["Hear!"] Several of the Gentlemen opposite who call "hear," as I have said, indulged in more violent language than if we had been attempting to destroy the Constitution, or subvert the religion of the country. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, spoke, as usual, with more moderation and temper on the subject than his followers; but still he stated very strongly his objections to the measure we proposed. He said—

"Sir, I object to the plan of the noble Lord on three distinct grounds. First, that if it were the feeling that such a Board of Education should be appointed—and the reverse is the case—it should not be appointed in the manner proposed by a single vote of this House. My next objection is, that any such Board of Education should be so constituted as to be exclusively composed of Her Majesty's Ministers. Thirdly, I object, in reference especially to the children of members of the Established Church, that there should be an entire exclusion of the ecclesiastical authorities who are properly placed in charge of the religious education of the community."

Sir, I am happy to say that the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues have now got over those objections. I am happy to say, that in this case, as in many others, they have adopted our measures; and they have appointed a Committee of the Council on Education, consisting of Her Majesty's Ministers, holding office at the pleasure of the Crown. I am glad, likewise, to see, that not only is the education grant increased this year, but the right hon Gentleman has lately said it is to be still further increased; and also that this Board will have greater power of interference, and larger authority, than it at present possesses, or than we formerly proposed to give it. I rejoice at this symptom of improved views—I rejoice that the objections which were then felt, and so unjustly expressed towards us, have yielded to sounder theories, and that they are only waiting an opportunity to carry them out into larger effect. For my own part, I have no want of confidence in the noble Lord the President of the Council, or those who act as his Colleagues in this benevolent and useful task; but I think, likewise, there is more to be done, and other measures which the House may adopt. After the Board has acted for some years without any interference with schools throughout the country—which, by the way, we never proposed in the slightest degree by the former scheme, you may give the Board means of uniting with a control over sums granted from the public funds, some control over sums raised by charitable endowments, so as to make those endowments, which are at present inefficient, effective for the purpose for which they were devised. I think, likewise, you may do that which was then proposed, and was a great object of jealousy—I never could tell why—give gratuities, or retiring allowances, to deserving schoolmasters, and perhaps some other mark of honour. They are members of the community on whom much depends—no trade or profession is more important or arduous; and yet you can hardly get any man of superior understanding to stay in it ten years; because it is, in fact, one of the least honoured and regarded by the community. I trust, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman will not be contented with what he has hitherto done. I think this grant of the present year is insufficient; and I hope that it will be much increased in the next. I certainly shall not raise to it any of that opposition by which we were formerly met. However entire may be my want of political confidence in those who sit opposite, I do not think so badly of them as to suppose that they would apply any of the funds intended for education in any way to promote party or political purposes. I believe they will apply them carefully and conscientiously, to promote the welfare of the community. Leaving this subject, to which I have deemed it necessary to advert, I must request that the Government, asking this House, as they do, to follow implicitly their dictates—asking their majority to vote for every measure they bring forward, and if by chance an adverse vote is given with respect to a part of any measure, asking them to submit to that which, to the feelings of this House, must be extremely repugnant, and rescind the vote, if it does not suit the convenience of Ministers—asking for this obedience, I must demand of them, when they meet us at the commencement of another Session, to propound some principles on which they mean firmly to stand. My hon. Friend, who was far more favourable than I was to their measure of academical education, said, "If you think fit to adopt new principles, I shall be glad to see you sincere converts to those which we have always professed, and which you formerly opposed; but you must be consistent and sincere, and propose good measures accordingly." But this has not been the case. The very reverse, indeed, has been the case. We heard the other day from the First Lord of the Treasury a protest against the principles of the Roman Catholic prelates, when they said that a professor of anatomy might instil heretical opinions into the minds of his pupils, and lead them away from the Roman Catholic Church. But a few days afterwards, we heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, who had pointed out himself the danger and impolicy of having tests in Ireland, and the necessity of abolishing such invidious distinctions, and of upholding the most liberal principles—we heard from that right hon. Gentleman a few days afterwards a tone entirely changed, and he argued in this House that it was necessary strictly to maintain tests in the Universities of Scotland; and those, too, not any general tests as to a belief in the vital doctrines of Christianity, or the truth of revelation, but a test discriminating the Presbyterian and the Episcopalian, and even between one set of Presbyterians and another. It is difficult for the House, however willing to give their confidence to a Government, to acquiesce in such a course; and by diminished majorities the House of Commons has showed that it is somewhat ashamed—that it is aware it is hardly to its credit to vote for one set of principles to-day, and for another set a few days after. Then, if the Ministers ask so much—if the votes of Parliament must be always in accordance with their own opinions, is it too much to ask of them in return, before another Session shall begin, to settle among themselves in their Cabinet what shall be the principles of the Session?—whether the voluntary principle, or the principle of an Establishment — whether education without religious tests, or education confined to one form of Christianity? Unless they do this, they can hardly expect, however sure of their majority, that the people of this country will view with respect the decisions of their Representatives. The people of this country, whatever may be their respective occupations—one man seemingly absorbed in merchandise, another in farming, another in some profession, every one engaged in some one or other pursuit—have yet each man some certain set of opinions which he entertains, and which he would regret to see departed from. You will find that every man in this country is more shocked at a total want of principle, than at the maintenance of principles opposed to his own opinion. In that case, even if he differs from the principle adopted by a majority of this House, he bows to its decisions with respect. But if there be continual wavering and change, no fixed and settled principle governing the conclusions of this House, he can entertain nothing but contempt and dislike for the decisions of those whom he sees are led in one course to day, and in another, and perhaps a directly opposite course some short time afterwards. I therefore put in my prayer that next Session we may see some principles laid down which may be understood to be the principles of the Government. In this I am asking what would be very convenient, undoubtedly, for the minority who are in opposition in this House; but I am also asking that which would be no less for the advantage of the majority, whose position at present must be exceedingly puzzling. If any Gentleman were asked by his friend, for example, in relation to the Irish academical measure, if he were a supporter of Her Majesty's Government, he might answer, "I am; I am against religious tests in Universities; I think them useless; and I consider the Roman Catholic bishops a bigoted set of men for requiring the introduction of them in the Colleges Bill. Therefore, I support the Government on this question." But the friend of this Gentleman would probably be greatly surprised to see his name next week in the list of a majority voting for the directly opposite principle. Before I sit down, I wish to allude to a report which is current respecting a proceeding which I believe would be, so far as I know, without precedent in this country. Her Majesty, it is said, is about to leave these shores for foreign parts as soon as the prorogation of Parliament takes place. We formerly had Sovereigns who possessed dominions in Germany, and who were accustomed frequently to leave this country; but in such cases a Council of Regency was always appointed. When George IV. visited his dominion in Hanover, Lords Justices were appointed during his absence. Now, Her Majesty, it is reported, is about to leave this country for three or four weeks, and it appears that no authority of this description is to be appointed, that the precedents to which I have alluded are not to be followed. It appears to me, that in this case, it would be the constitutional course that some depository of the power of Majesty should be appointed; and I do hope that it is not the intention of the Government to depart from the course invariably followed on former similar occasions. I cannot allude to this part of the subject without making one more reference to the situation of Ireland. Her Majesty having twice visited Scotland, it would have been most grateful to Her to be able to visit Her subjects in Ireland, who, I believe, are as loyal and affectionate as any part of Her people. But when an address was presented upon this subject, the answer which Her Majesty was advised to make was studiously ambiguous; and, as I understood it—though in that I may not be correct in my interpretation—implied a doubt on the part of the Ministers, whether Her Majesty would receive a welcome in that part of Her dominions. It would be painful to think, as King William IV. was prevented visiting the city, by those who were then his advisers, that Her Majesty should be hindered from visiting Her subjects in Ireland also by the advice of the Ministers of the Crown, from a doubt as to Her reception. I trust it is not on that account that the visit to Ireland has been postponed. I trust Her Majesty might rely—I think She might safely rely—upon receiving a cordial welcome, if She visited Her subjects in Ireland. Still it is impossible not to draw some inference from the very ambiguous expressions put into the mouth of Her Majesty, in answer to the Address of the Mayor and Corporation of Dublin. I am sure if Ministers perform their duty—if they conduct the government of Ireland in the manner it ought to be conducted, with a view to the welfare of the people—there can be no doubt of the Sovereign meeting with the warmest welcome from the people of Ireland. At all events, whatever may be thought of the advisers of the Crown, I feel assured, that, personally, Her Majesty might expect, and would receive, the most affectionate reception. With these observations I shall conclude. I have occupied the time of the House longer than I ought; but I have a precedent for the course I have taken, in speeches made in a very different spirit from that in which I have had the honour of addressing you—speeches intended solely to show the delay that had taken place, and the imperfections in measures that had been introduced by the Government of that day. It was much easier to make such a speech at that time, as there was then an unscrupulous opposition to the measures of Her Majesty's Government in this House, and a majority adverse to the Government in the other House of Parliament. But now, with a large and confiding majority here, and a large and confiding majority in another House, it is, notwithstanding, impossible for the Ministers of the Crown to say that they have brought all their measures to perfection, that they have not altered some, and have not abandoned others. I do not impute this as matter of blame to the Government. Some of these measures, it is true, might have been better considered prior to their introduction into Parliament; but I feel that the business of the House, combined with the duties of executive government, are so heavy, so harassing, so continuous, that there can be no wonder some measures are brought forward in a state in which they are not found fit to receive the sanction of the two Houses of Parliament. With respect to the attendance of Members of this House upon the business of the country, neither the Ministers of the Crown, nor Her Majesty, nor the people at large, have reason to complain. There has been a most assiduous attention on the part of the Members of this House to the public business, and a most assiduous attention also to the business of Committees in the investigation of railway questions, not affording the excitement and interest of political debates; but in regard to which this House imposed upon itself a rule, because they thought it their duty towards the public. Whatever, then, may be said of our political conduct, or of the trust we ought to repose in the Ministers of the Crown, I must say that so far as regards assiduous and laborious attention, both to public and private business, the House of Commons has exceeded—and you, Sir, must know that fact as well as any one here—any Parliament of preceding years. The noble Lord concluded by moving for—and also for a List of the Public Bills which have passed a Second Reading, distinguishing those which have since become law, during the present Session."

Sir J. Graham said: The noble Lord has concluded a speech marked by his accustomed ability, and by some degree of bitterness. Certainly, as to the ability, I cannot hope to compete with him; with respect to the bitterness—[Mr. Sheil here made some remark.] I know not why the right hon. Gentleman interrupts me thus early in my address [Mr. Sheil: I beg your pardon]; I never interrupt the right hon. Gentleman when he is speaking. I was about to say, that not feeling any of that bitterness the noble Lord has expressed, I have no wish to return it. The noble Lord has concluded with a most harmless Motion, to which I can have no objection. The House may think it was hardly my duty to rise after the noble Lord on the present occasion; but he has dealt generally with domestic questions in which I have officially taken a large part, and from some of the topics to which the noble Lord has adverted, I think it my duty to offer some observations to the House. In the first place, I would observe, that I think it quite consistent with the position held by the leader of a great party, at the close of a Session like this, marked by the consideration of such important subjects, that he should pass under review the measures of the Session; and I have no complaint to make of his doing so, nor against the object of his Motion. Sir, the noble Lord has asked two important questions—he anxiously inquires in what way the Ministers of the Crown have performed their duties? and what is the general position of this country? He has said, that several measures of importance have been delayed during the present Session, and he has also adverted to measures which have been introduced and abandoned. The noble Lord has observed, that the abandonment of measures introduced is a mark of incompetence on the part of the Minister who so introduces and so abandons them. That observation does not apply to my Colleagues; it applies only to me, and is made in reference to the Physic and Surgery Bill. Now, I should certainly have thought, of all the measures that could be introduced into this House, which might be considered impossible to be drawn into the vortex of political conflict, this was the measure. I see behind the noble Lord the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Warburton) and the hon. Member for Lambeth—they will say, that it is not possible to undertake a task of more desperate difficulty than to legislate on this particular subject. They will not agree with the noble Lord, that the abandonment of a measure on that peculiar subject is a proof of incompetency to deal with great questions. I must say, I cannot conceive I failed in my duty; because, receiving representations from parties having conflicting interests in a question personally affecting their position in society, and their interests in other respects, I modified that Bill, or yielded a priority to measures that appeared of more pressing urgency. I may state also my conviction, that if time had permitted, I by no means despaired of the success of the measure. The noble Lord proceeded to advert to various questions, following the course of the Queen's Speech—first, as to foreign policy; next, as to questions of a domestic nature. With regard to the first branch of those questions—our foreign relations—I am happy to be able to concur with everything that has fallen from the noble Lord. He has congratulated the House and the country, that whereas at the close of last Session, there was a misunderstanding between France and England—now, happily for the peace of Europe and the world, and for the interests of this country and France, a good understanding prevails between these two great nations. I cordially agree with the noble Lord in his regret at the loss sustained by the departure of the able, accomplished, and amiable Minister of the United States (Mr. Everett). But that country, I am happy to state, will be well represented still by the highly esteemed Minister who has just arrived; and I am convinced, that in the negotiations pending between the two countries, there will be every disposition to maintain relations of amity. The noble Lord then proceeded to other topics: the first subject he referred to was the administration of the affairs of Ireland. The noble Lord alluded to renunciations of former opinions, and adverted to a hasty expression used by me some years ago in the heat of debate, of which, on more than one occasion, I have offered an explanation to the House, which I thought had been satisfactory. I feel a deep sense of responsibility with regard to that country; and if the noble Lord believes for a moment that my official conduct could be swayed by the feelings or opinions exhibited in that hasty expression, he does me great injustice, the extent of which I hope is demonstrated by my public conduct. But the noble Lord also said much from which I cannot dissent. I think with him that the rule of the Government of Ireland ought to be equality of civil privileges, and impartial laws fairly administered. The noble Lord censures the Government for not having brought forward in the present Session some amendment of the Municipal Act, and of the elective franchise of that country, and that we have preferred other questions to these. Let the House remember that, at the close of last Session, Lord Monteagle, a former Colleague of the noble Lord, pressed in the strongest manner—and I may add in the ablest manner—the consideration of the question of the increased endowment of the College of Maynooth on the Government. The hon. Member for Waterford, also, in season and out of season—both when he was a Member of the Government, and when he was opposed to it, never failed to urge on the attention of the Legislature, the extension of collegiate education in Ireland, as a matter of primary importance. Her Majesty's Government have exercised their discretion as to the topics they should bring forward; and seeing, with respect to the elective franchise, that in another Session there would be time enough to consider it before it would probably be called into operation, we thought we were discharging our duty by giving a preference to the two questions we brought under the notice of the Legislature, and which we have succeeded in bringing to a successful termination—the endowment of Maynooth, and the establishment of larger means of academical education in Ireland. With respect to the Municipal Act, let me call to the attention of the noble Lord that at the time an alteration in the municipal franchise in Ireland was introduced by the late Government, we stated that equality and identity of the franchise in Ireland and in England, it was impossible to establish; but equality without identity with the franchise in England is possible. The Earl of St. Germans was the organ through whom we ourselves presented a Bill on the subject of municipal corporations in Ireland that did establish complete equality of the franchise with that of England. From that measure we have not receded; to that we have adhered, and are prepared to adhere. So also with respect to the elective franchise. We have argued that question, and have shown to the House, that with respect to the franchise in cities and towns in Ireland, equality does exist with the elective franchise in England; and that, if anything, the money value is favourable to Ireland, and that in Ireland the sum which is the measure of the franchise is lower, as contrasted with the sum in England. In counties great difficulty has existed. Doubts have been raised and entertained by courts of law with respect to the legal interpretation of what constitutes the franchise. We have stated our willingness to remove those doubts, and to establish an improved elective franchise in Ireland, which shall enlarge the basis of the constituency. We by no means recede from that assurance; and as with respect to the municipal franchise, so also with respect to the county franchise, there is no indisposition on the part of the Government to introduce measures which shall establish in Ireland perfect equality as contrasted with the franchise in England. The noble Lord next proceeded to advert to the Landlord and Tenant Commission. He did not blame the issuing of that Commission; but he censured the Government for not giving effect to the recommendations of the Commission, if they thought those recommendations satisfactory. I beg the House to remember that the Report of that Commission was not presented to the Government until after the commencement of the present Session of Parliament. I know not whether hon. Members have seen the evidence collected by the Commission; for, until a recent period, the whole has not been printed. It is most voluminous, but most worthy of attentive consideration. Several measures were recommended by the Commission; and the noble Lord has commented on the Bill which was introduced into the other House of Parliament by a noble Member of the Government. The machinery by which it was sought to give effect to the object in view, is a matter certainly open to comment and difference of opinion; but with respect to the object of the Bill itself, I do not think that in this House any objection can be entertained to it. It is admitted, that in Great Britain and Ireland, different customs prevail with respect to outlay on the part of the tenant. There are certain improvements, and certain necessary outlays, which in Great Britain are generally—I might say universally—borne by the landlord; but which in Ireland are universally borne by the tenant. A great hardship, therefore, exists whenever a tenant in Ireland is suddenly ejected, he having no claim for compensation on account of this outlay. It did appear to the Government, as it had appeared to the Commission, that some security should be given to the tenant in cases of ejectment, for obtaining compensation on account of outlays benefiting the landlord; but which compensation is now, neither by custom nor by law, secured to the tenant. It was, therefore, the object of the Bill in question, under certain safeguards and restrictions, to secure to the tenant that which he is most justly entitled to. The mode in which it was sought to effect that object might be open to comment and stricture; but the question as to the mode of effecting the object is one comparatively of detail, and not of principle. To the principle of the Bill introduced into the House of Lords, I most decidedly adhere; and should a similar Bill be discussed in this House, its principle is one which I feel confident can be advocated and defended with complete success. The noble Lord then adverted to the Maynooth Bill, and to the Irish Colleges Bill; and, considering that, in the general principle of those measures, the noble Lord entirely concurred, I was surprised, that after the ample discussion which they underwent, the noble Lord should have thought it expedient, on the present occasion, to revive topics of disagreement which have been urged with the most bitter hostility against both those measures. The noble Lord spoke of the inconsistency of the Government in proposing that in the new Colleges in Ireland (regard being had to the peculiar circumstances of that country) no test should be imposed on the teachers or students, while in Scotland, in reference to ancient Universities which had existed for more than a century in a particular form, and in conformity with a solemn national compact, the Government had felt it their duty to uphold existing tests. I will not now stop to reconcile that inconsistency; but I must say that, with respect to political decisions, various and conflicting circumstances naturally and justly lead to opposite political conclusions. The noble Lord then adverted to former differences which existed in this House in respect to what is termed the Appropriation Clause. I am really surprised that he should bring that topic forward; because I thought that he himself, and the Government to which he belonged, after trying for four or five years to enforce that principle, had deliberately abandoned it. The noble Lord now charges us with bringing before the House, and throwing into discussion uselessly, the great alternatives with respect to which, he says, the decision of the Legislature must sooner or later be given—namely, the question how you shall arrive at religious equality in Ireland—whether by endowing the Roman Catholic religion, and raising that religion to the level of the Protestant, or by abolishing the Protestant Establishment. With respect to the last alternative, I need not say that insuperable objections to it would be found both in the feelings of the people of England, and also in the feelings of their Representatives, as testified by their votes in this House. For myself, I cannot conceive any circumstances, at any time, that would induce me to advocate or consent to such a proposition. The abolition of the Protestant Established Church in Ireland would be such a shock to the rights of property in that country, and such a violation of the most solemn agreement—it would be so adverse to the feelings, and to the sense of right of the people of this country—that it would be a measure fraught with the utmost danger, and impossible to be carried, without open violence. With respect to the other alternative, it is not for me to argue that question now. I have repeatedly asserted, that to the endowment of the Roman Catholic clergy I personally have no insuperable objections; but I again repeat that to any such proposal emanating from the Government at the present time, and under present circumstances, I see the greatest possible resistance would be offered. No measure proposed by the Government involves the assertion of any such principle, which is left perfectly open to the future consideration of Parliament. I certainly am aware that the tendency of events in this country is necessarily to raise these important questions. I believe the solution of them with all their difficulties will be found almost impossible. I know not what may be in the womb of time; but I am quite certain that it is not the duty of the Government, having regard to the peace of this great Empire, to precipitate the discussion of these questions, or to urge them forward. The noble Lord says that the policy pursued with respect to Ireland has satisfied no party. I should regret the fact, if I admitted the truth of the assertion. The policy has been one of strict justice; yet, as it has been meted out with an impartial and firm hand, amidst the conflict of the most angry passions and feelings in Ireland, this circumstance certainly does expose the Executive Government to the risk of satisfying, as the noble Lord stated, no party. It may not be possible to exhibit strict impartiality in suppressing the violence of two conflicting parties, without incurring, to a certain extent, the resentment and anger of both; but it is the firm determination of the Government, charged with the administration of the affairs of Ireland, steadily and firmly to persevere in a course of even and impartial justice, and to endeavour to secure to all perfect equality of civil rights. The noble Lord, turning from Ireland, discussed the question of education in this country. I think, next to the question of Ireland, in importance, is the question of the state of education in this country. The noble Lord has done justice to the Government with reference to their efforts to extend the benefits of education. Though our efforts may not have been successful to the extent which might be desirable, yet, since we have been responsible for the government, we have succeeded in doing much. On a former occasion, my right hon. Friend pointed out the great increase in schools which had been founded both in connexion with the National Society and the British and Foreign Society throughout the country. We have also extended the means of education for masters, and have planted excellent schools on the best models in various manufacturing districts, through the operation of the clause passed in the Factories Bill. That clause worked in a most satisfactory manner. The quality of the education was improved; and the effect of the general provisions of the Factories Act was to secure to a great body of children in the manufacturing districts, generally under twelve years of age, education under masters competent to teach them, for at least three days in the week, and for three hours during each of such days. I am happy to say that, concurrently with the operation of these measures, the progress in the decrease of crime is most encouraging. The noble Lord says, that legislatively we have done nothing with respect to the health and comfort of the working classes. It is my opinion, which I have often expressed, that their health and comfort are mainly promoted by securing to them the first necessaries of life. And here I come to a portion of the policy of the Government which the noble Lord commented on with justice, giving the Government credit for their acts and good intentions. The noble Lord referred to the great decrease made in the present Session with respect to the duties levied on all articles of raw material connected with our manufactures, and also on many articles connected with general consumption. I beg also to remind the noble Lord, in speaking of the health and comfort of the working classes, that a Commission has carefully inquired into the subject, and its Report has not only been taken into consideration, but has been embodied in a legislative form. There has been laid on the Table of the House, by a noble Lord a Member of the Government, a measure comprehensive in its nature, and intended to secure the health and comfort of the working classes, by local taxation on the property of the different localities. During the recess the Government will have time to give more consideration to the subject, and will be able with better effect to call the attention of the House to it early in next Session. To come now to the question of finance. The noble Lord approves of the imposition of the Income Tax, coupled as it was with the remission of duties on various articles of raw material which enter largely into our manufactures; but then the noble Lord says, that there are other measures which we ought to have introduced, but which we have omitted to bring forward. Now, I do think, that considering the labours of this Session, it ought to be borne in mind, that if we have been unable to introduce measures respecting the franchise in Ireland, up to the period of the Easter recess, the Income Tax expiring on the 5th of April, the time of the Government and of Parliament was mainly occupied in discussing the propriety of reimposing the Income Tax, and the remission of various duties. The noble Lord stated that generally he approved of the remission of duties and of the Income Tax; but then he referred specifically to three important articles with respect to which he differed from the measures which have been adopted by Her Majesty's Government. Sir, I am not at this period of the Session—almost its last expiring hours—about to revive all the debates which have taken place with respect to these articles; but I must be permitted to say with reference to the timber duties, that, as compared with the duties we found imposed on timber upon our coming into office, it cannot be disputed that a great improvement has been made by the present altered rate. The duty on Colonial timber has been altogether remitted; the duty on Baltic timber has been greatly reduced, and much to the advantage of the consumer. The price also has been considerably lowered. The consequence has been an increased consumption, and we have derived a large revenue from Baltic timber, coincident with great relief to the consumer. This is the case with respect to the alterations in the timber duties. Then as to the subject of sugar: here, again, what is the working of the alteration with respect to the interests of the consumer? You may dispute the policy of our measure, and you may say that it was politically erroneous as well as morally defective, in making a difference between slave-grown sugar and sugar the produce of free labour; but practically it has been beneficial. Experience shows, that while the Revenue has gained, the consumer has also benefited materially by the alteration. Six months' experience—the experience of the last six months, which are not, be it remembered, the six months of the year in which the consumption is the largest—shows that an increase in the consumption has taken place approaching to 30,000 tons, instead of 20,000 tons, which would have been the half of the anticipated increase of 40,000 tons on the consumption of the entire year, and the sum yielded to the Revenue has increased proportionably; while the retail price of sugar has, since our measure was passed, fallen 1½*d.* a pound. With respect to the anticipations of the noble Lord of a defective harvest, the noble Lord has been alarmed by some mist that hung over the Surrey hills ten days ago, which perhaps gave a colour to the noble Lord's views on this subject; and I ascribe the Motion of the noble Lord very much to this particular topic of his speech. The noble Lord was probably actuated in making it very much by the particular apprehensions he felt with respect to the harvest; for he intimated that the prospects of this country at the present moment were gloomy, and I think he said almost unparalleled. Now, first, I must remark, that there are at the present moment in bond of foreign corn, wheat, and wheat flour, no less than 450,000 quarters. In the year 1839, when the noble Lord was responsible for the conduct of affairs, what was the position of the country in this respect? Was it similar to the present position of affairs, which the noble Lord says is unexampled? Allow me to remind the noble Lord, that on the 6th of August, 1839, there were in bond in this country only 51,000 quarters of foreign corn, whereas we have 450,000 quarters in bond now; and that, further, on the same 6th of August, 1839, there were in the Bank of England only 2,450,000*l.* in specie; whereas, at this moment, there are 16,000,000*l.* of specie in the coffers of the Bank of England. Did the noble Lord in 1839, at the end of the Session, such being the position of the country, come forward and propose any alteration of the Corn Laws? Did he come forward to do so at the end of the Session of 1840? Did he at the end of the Session of 1841? As a Member of the Government, and as a responsible Minister of the Crown, feeling deeply the situation of the country, with only 51,000 quarters of foreign corn in bond, and only 2,450,000*l.* of specie in the coffers of the Bank of England, did he come forward and propose a remedy by means of an alteration in the Corn Laws? No; neither then, nor in the immedately succeeding Sessions, did he propose any such thing. The noble Lord, however, has not refrained from remarking upon the delusion, as he called it, of our professions, and of our sliding scale, which he described as "small by degrees, and beautifully less;" but when the noble Lord so derided our sliding scale, had he no other scale, "small by degrees, and beautifully less," in his recollection? Was there not a proposition of an 8*s.* fixed duty, which fell down to 6*s.*, and then to 5*s.*; still getting "so small by degrees," to use again the noble Lord's quotation, "and beautifully less," that the noble Lord had great difficulty to persuade many Gentlemen on this side of the House, that he meant to give them any protection at all? Sir, I am fully aware, that with the rapidly increasing population of this country, the difficulty of supplying it with food must necessarily increase also; but I am happy to know that the increase of home grown corn, arising out of the improvements that have been made in agriculture, has been very great within the last few years; and at the present moment, when some persons are indulging gloomy anticipations as to the approaching harvest, there is the largest quantity of old home-grown wheat in store ever known at this period of the year. As regards the price, the average price of the last six weeks, made up to the present day, is 49*s.* 11*d.* a quarter; and the average price of the week is considerably less than 54*s.* a quarter. I agree with the noble Lord that a bad harvest is a most severe infliction of Providence on any nation; but I must add that no legislation, however well devised, can secure any country from that calamity and its consequences; and I am not one of those who think that it is an evil of the existing law, that at a time when there are serious apprehensions that the harvest may be deficent, corn cannot suddenly be taken out of bond, but must be gradually brought to market with a duty decreasing as price increases; and thus, while a supply is secured, there is imposed on the consumer the necessity of caution and frugality. That is the operation of the present Corn Law. But so far am I from entertaining the apprehensions of the noble Lord, that I am still sanguine in the hope that no very great deficiency of supply and increase of price is to be apprehended. At all events, I do not think that at this period of the Session, the House can sanction any alteration of the Corn Laws, which have been discussed at great length in previous debates, and on which the opinion of the House may fairly be said to have been pronounced, and pronounced by large majorities. Before I sit down, I will advert to only one other topic, to which I think it my duty to offer a few words in answer to the noble Lord. He spoke of the possibility of Her Majesty's visit to Her Irish subjects; and he appeared to think that, from the answer which Her Majesty was advised to give from the Throne to the Lord Mayor of Dublin, some conclusion might be drawn that Her Majesty's answer meant to convey some doubt of the loyal reception which awaited Her in Ireland. Now, I think, that in deducing this conclusion, the noble Lord is either mistaking, or has forgotten, the terms of that answer. I am quite satisfied that Her Majesty felt that whenever she visited Ireland, she would be cordially received. Whatever may be the state of that unhappy country, and however torn by the conflict of angry passions, I am quite satisfied that whenever Her Majesty may visit that portion of Her dominions, Her presence would be the harbinger of peace; and that there would be but one cordial and ardent wish to greet her with loyalty and devotion.

Mr. M. J. O'Connell, as an Irish Member, wished to express his thanks to the noble Lord for having brought the state of Ireland under the notice of the House. He thought that the tone in which the noble Lord expressed himself towards Ireland would have a beneficial effect on that country, and he trusted it would have some effect on the Ministers. The Government ought not to have brought in a measure founded on the Report of the Landlord and Tenant Commission unless they were sure of making it effectual. The party opposite, after for ten years opposing the giving equality of franchise, were now ready to concede it; but their readiness now was of no more use to Ireland than their opposition was before. With respect to the Church question, he must say, though with no sectarian views, and wishing to live on terms of friendship and equality with his Protestant brethren, that it was a serious matter to leave that question unsettled for another year or two. Something ought to be done while there was yet time. He wished the Government to take no extreme, but a middle course; and he still thought they might succeed in allaying the religious animosities which existed in Ireland. He would not leave them until they became too formidable to settle without a collision and a certain exposure to all the mischiefs of party contests. When the Government appointed a Commission to inquire into the condition of landlords and tenants, they were warned that if they were not prepared to do something it would be better far to leave the evils of Ireland as they were. They did, however, give hopes that something would be done; but even the hopes of the most rational men had been most cruelly disappointed by the measure which had been introduced into the other House of Parliament. Not one of the Commissioners who conducted the inquiry had been consulted on the details of that measure; and it was well known that, out of five noble Lords and Gentlemen of different politics who belonged to it, no one had given his approval of the measure. Besides this, the Government was somewhat unfortunate in the selection of the individual who brought that measure forward. No one could deny his talent; his ability in debate was unrivalled; and that he was a good landlord there was evidence; but with all this he might be a bad legislator. That noble individual talked of the safeguards for the tenant, by which safeguards the tenant would just gain nothing; as, under the Registration Act, the restrictions, the forms and conditions required from the tenant were such as to deprive him of all the benefit intended or professed to be given by the measure. He thought it would be worth while during the recess for the Government to prepare some really beneficial measure for the tenantry of Ireland, which should not be nullified by accompanying restrictions. By doing so, they would be able to deal with the question of the Irish franchise, which they never could unless they first settled that of the nature of the tenure of landlords and tenants. He hoped that next Session the Government would be able to carry out measures in the spirit of that of one which he had before expressed his approval. He did not over-estimate it, but he took it as an indication that they would do yet more. He hoped, indeed, that in the course of a few Sessions that House, whoever might form the Administration, would be able to congratulate itself that they had made some greater progress in the settlement of those questions, which, while they were troublesome to the House, were disgraceful to the Empire in the eyes of the civilized world.

Mr. Plumptre said, it was neither an unusual nor objectionable thing to review, at the close of the Session, the chief measures which had occupied the attention of Parliament. When the right hon. Baronet, at the commencement of the Session, introduced the Maynooth Bill, he (Mr. Plumptre) expressed his objections to that measure; and now that it had passed into a law, he was of opinion that it was no less objectionable. The more he considered that measure, the less was the satisfaction with which he viewed it. He could not avoid asking the question, had it given satisfaction to Ireland? Had it not been the means of dividing a great party in that country? They should not forget, that if it had been left to the decision of the usual supporters of Her Majesty's Ministers, it would have been lost. Of the usual supporters of Ministers, 152 voted against the measure, and 150 in its favour. If it had been left to the strength of the supporters of Government, it could not have been carried. The Statute Book was disgraced by having such an enactment; and next Session he should—though not with much hope of success—feel it his duty to do what in him lay to remove from the Statute Book that which the country considered to be a most obnoxious Statute. It would have been much better to have left the improvement of affairs in Ireland to the progress of public opinion. He did not know whether hon. Gentlemen were aware of what was going on in Germany; and what was taking place there might be expected to occur in Ireland. [The hon. Member read an extract from a book entitled, "The Apostolic Christian, or the Catholic Church in Germany," which detailed the proceedings of John Ronge with reference to the "Coat of Treves," and also contained the abjuration of the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church by several citizens of Esterfield.] He read that extract because he thought, that if in Ireland they exhibited the same boldness and honesty as were shown in Germany, a far happier state of things would take place in that country than any such measure as the Maynooth Bill was calculated to produce. There were other subjects which at that late hour he was not disposed to detain the House by entering on. He had heard with satisfaction the statement of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department, that there was at the present time a larger quantity of bonded foreign corn in this country than in 1837, and also more home-grown corn than at that time. He was sorry to say, that in the county with which he was connected, wheat was considerably blighted. He would not enter upon any other topics, but conclude by expressing his regret that Her Majesty's Government should have brought forward some of the measures which they had thought it necessary to pass, as it was always with great pain he opposed the present Government.

Mr. Moffatt begged to call the attention of the House to two points which had been overlooked on the present occasion. The first related to the alteration which had been made in the Sugar Duties. The home consumption had increased, it was stated, 30 per cent. in consequence of the reduction of the duties; but the official returns made the increase 33 per cent. So far that was favourable to the principle of reduction. But, at the same time, notwithstanding the great increase of consumption, the revenue would be very much diminished—a consequence which might be avoided by opening our ports to the markets of the world. What was the practical result of that alteration? It improved the value of free-labour sugar, but it improved the value of slave-labour sugar at the same time. The arguments used against throw ing open the trade was, therefore, at an end; for it appeared that the effect had been to stimulate the price of slave-grown, to discourage which was the professed object of the opposition to a more enlarged commercial policy. He therefore hoped, that next Session the right hon. Baronet would come forward and throw open all the markets of the world to British commerce. There now remained no pretext for refusing to do that. The other point to which he (Mr. Moffatt) referred, was one which had not at all received the attention of the House. He alluded to our trade with India and China. They were all aware of the advantageous results expected from the Treaty which Sir Henry Pottinger had effected, but they had not considered how these advantages were to be realized. Our trade with China, as compared with that of the last ten years, had increased 300 per cent. How were the Chinese to pay or to meet this increase of trade but by the article of tea? The Chinese had set us a liberal and wise example by throwing open their ports at a small rate of duty. They charged upon our importations only 10 per cent. duty, while we levied upon their tea a duty of 200 per cent. That was a system not calculated to maintain or extend our trade in that quarter. We have had in this country an increase in importations to the extent of 34 per cent. But how had consumption been forced? By a large depreciation of price at the cost of the import merchant. The consumption might, by a reduction of duty, be legitimately increased, to the advantage of the revenue and the benefit of the community. He trusted that these subjects would receive the attention of Her Majesty's Government during the recess.

Mr. Villiers said, that he thought, from the attention which had been given to the practical observations of the hon. Member for Dartmouth, that the hon. Member for Kent might satisfy himself that he was not, as he had said, out of place when he departed from his usual strain in giving the House useful information. The hon. Member for Kent should not either think that when he referred to such matters as the subsistence of the people, that he was stating anything foreign to practical Christianity. He apologized to the House for his allusion to the prospect of the harvest offered in the county of Kent. He would excuse him if he said that to this House and to the country, that part of his speech would have a far greater interest than his reference to his peculiar religious views, and that when he would give the House information connected with this subject, as he learnt them in his county, he would always command the attention of the House. He had stated a very important fact to the House, peculiarly so at this moment. He told them that the wheat was very generally blighted in Kent—a fact worthy the notice of the right hon. Secretary of State, who was at a loss to discover how anybody could feel anxious about the harvest. The right hon. Secretary wondered where the noble Lord had been living; he thought on the top of the Surrey hills, where, enveloped in some mist, the noble Lord had fancied that the harvest of this year might be deficient. Why, he might ask in return, where the right hon. Gentleman had been living, or what he had been reading of late? He should have thought that if he had communicated with any person in the street, or had read any of the ordinary organs of information, he might have explained the fears expressed by the noble Lord, for he would venture to say, that it was the universal topic of discussion at this moment in the country—that no two people met without exchanging their apprehensions on the subject; and that peculiar uneasiness was felt in consequence of the weather for the last few days. And why should the right hon. Gentleman be surprised when he repeated to-night what he said before, that one of the greatest curses that could befall the people, would be a bad harvest? By which he meant that an insufficient supply of food in the present state of the country, was one of the severest inflictions of Heaven. With those opinions of the right hon. Gentleman, which probably differed from those of some of his friends, why should he not think it worthy of thought, and why had he not met the grounds on which the noble Lord rested his fears, by some assurance that they were baseless? "If the right hon. Gentleman has no fear on this subject, he must have exclusive information. Why does he not communicate it—why does he not tell us that a bad harvest, with which we have been visited so frequently, will not recur? It is all important to the country, on account of that policy which places this country in the critical position of depending upon the hazards and accidents of a season in this small portion of the globe; and as this is the condition which at this time of the year we are always placed in, and as it is wholly unnecessary, it does become intimately connected with any review of the proceedings of a Session to learn if anything has been done to relieve the country from so precarious a dependence. The right hon. Gentleman and the Government seem to be perfectly alive to the evils now which follow from dearness and scarcity; they are consequently alive to the blessings which attend the failure of the Corn Law. We are fresh from the experience of that law having failed in its purpose in raising price by limiting quantity; and the right hon. Gentlemen has been clear and complete in his acknowledgment of the great blessing which has attended that failure. The right hon. Gentleman has declared to this House that since food has been cheap and abundant, he had to congratulate the country upon everything which he would most desire to see—the people were contented, the country prosperous, and a great diminution of all those ills, moral and social, incident to a densely peopled country, which extend so fearfully when the usual disturbance occurs which attends dearness and scarcity. He admits that this has followed upon a good harvest. Is it unreasonable to ask if he expects that we shall always be blessed with a good harvest, and if not, if he has taken any precaution to prevent a scarcity of supply, the result of a bad one?" They were about then to separate with a perfect knowledge of the cause of past suffering and present prosperity—with a belief that the cause of prosperity was accidental, and with as perfect a conviction, he believed, that such prosperity need not depend upon accident; that their impolitic meddling with the trade was the occasion of all the doubt and danger that existed at this time. He had often complained at that season of the year of the House separating without doing anything to place the trade in food upon a solid steady footing; but never did he think it so entirely reasonable to do so as he did this year. Never was the experience so complete—never was the opportunity so good, of changing the law—never were the principles on which that law was rested more thoroughly discredited—never had measures based on the opposite principles been so completely successful. Circumstances and opinion had alike called for the change; and it was fair matter of observation and reproach, at the end of the Session, that nothing had been done towards it. He did not hesitate to say, that if all the measures that had been carried this Session had been postponed, and the community provided with something like security for a constant adequate supply of food, that more would have been done for the future happiness and prosperity of the country; and he would go further and say, that if the evil of a bad harvest were to occur again, that nothing that had been done of a beneficial kind during the Session, would be felt or appreciated; and he would apply that particularly to those great public works which they had been so assiduously engaged about this Session. And why had they been engaged in them? Why did they hear of so many? Simply because the people were prosperous, because there was a large available surplus of capital, because the annual income of the country was larger this year than it had been for years past. "But all these works being accomplished depend upon the continuance of prosperity; and if anything should occur to disturb our credit, or disturb our economical arrangements in this country, which invariably follows when the harvest is bad, then, I say, nothing but loss, and ruin, and suffering will attend those who have embarked in them; and it is well worthy the notice of those who have contributed to those schemes, that there is no instance where the price of food has risen, arising from deficient supply, that such undertakings have not been among the first to feel it and to suffer from it. To these works to which we have been giving our sanction, we have been showing our faith and respect for the principle of competition. There is not a line of railway that has been proposed, that might not be opposed on the same grounds that the proprietors of this country oppose competition in the market with their produce; and yet so little faith have we in monopoly when it does not profit some favoured interest, that let but any rival line show that the public can be served cheaper and better by a competition, and legislative sanction is instantly given to it." The proprietors of the country asked of that House to make them an exception to this principle; and they on that side asked why they should be excepted? How were they different from all other men? How had they shown that they ought to be trusted? Had they not frequently left the public deficient—had they proved that they had taken the best means that they should be properly supplied? Had they proved that those under them were happy and contented? or had they recommended their system by any one circumstance? They were, however, to be excepted. He then asked of the Minister, with his views of the evils of deficient supply, what steps he had taken to prevent the recurrence of that calamity? They took the supply of food out of the natural operations of commerce. What did they substitute? "The Government support their party in this exclusive privilege of supplying the people with food. Have they taken any security that they will do it adequately? Can they give the country any assurance that what has happened before will not recur? Do they know that everything which skilful husbandry can accomplish has been done; that they are by common consent dealing with their properties in the manner most likely to produce an abundant supply of food? And if they do not, how can they justify the system? The public are well supplied with everything in which the law does not interfere. The case which we make is, that the same would happen with regard to food if commerce was allowed to be free. The case of the advocates of perfect free trade was, that the merchants, manufacturers, the capitalists of this country, would prove at the bar of the House that they could, by their united energies, supply this community with food as cheaply and plentifully as it was possible to be done. You trust them in everything else, you mistrust them when you don't succeed in any system you substitute, and when it is all-important there should be success." He said that their course was more dangerous now were it pursued, than it had been before, and one which could not with safety be persevered in. In former times, Governments had defended vigorously this system of protection. They deemed it essential, they fostered every prejudice connected with it, confirmed every fallacy, and encouraged the ignorance by which it was maintained, and they were consistent in their measures accordingly; but the present Ministry had done just the contrary—they had left nothing undone to prove the hollowness of their own principles of protection; they had introduced competition in everything else, and had declared themselves favourable to the application of that principle in everything but food; they had, in short, stripped the principle of protection of all its pretences of even indirect good, and had left it in full force where it was most severely tried, and where its failure was most fatal to the people. "Let it also be remembered that when the disasters of a bad harvest recur, that there will then be no mode of accounting for the ills it brings with it by any of those idle fallacies which have appeased the people before. The people have been taught by experience how false and hollow are all the things put forth to divert their minds from the real cause of their misery before. It will be impossible to tell the people that it was over-production that deprived them of employment, or too much machinery, or an over issue of money, or the cupidity of manufacturers, or the inability of exporting to foreign countries. They have seen that with the increase of all these things—more machinery than ever, more production than ever, more money than ever, more manufactures and more wealth accumulated, more hostile tariffs than ever—yet they have had better wages, more employment, and are generally in a better condition than before; and that there is no way of accounting for the improvement but by the restoration of our internal commerce and our usual consumption, and all the arrangements for production consequent upon the abundant harvests that we have had for two seasons past." He said, then, that when a period of distress recurred, from deficient food, that the causes of this mischief would be obvious to the humblest man, and that, therefore, the responsibility would be fixed much more distinctly upon a few than it had been before. A poor consolation to those who suffered; but it ought to be surely a matter of serious consideration for the political majorities of the two Houses of Legislature, that to them the public would justly turn as the authors of their calamity, in persisting in a course of which they had been so frequently forewarned and counselled against. He knew no persons who would have to share that responsibility with them but the electors of those great towns who, holding the franchise in trust for the non-electors, had preferred obeying the orders or pandering to the objects of the rich, rather than extending justice and protection to the poor and the powerless; and they would and must be, upon any occasion of confusion, justly and indignantly reproached for their breach of trust in returning Members to that House who, to serve the interests of a favoured class, impeded the commerce and restricted the supply of the people's food.

Mr. Milner Gibson would venture to doubt whether any oppression which it fell to the lot of the Irish to suffer, whether any infraction of the civil rights of any portion of the Empire, was greater than the oppression practised upon this country by those who supported the Corn Law monopoly. The question of the Corn Laws was not second in importance to any question of civil liberty and equality in Ireland. It stood before them as a question in which the civil rights of the people of this country were concerned, and was a question very seriously involving their happiness and prosperity. Bills on physic and surgery, Bills for education and religion, were important in themselves, but the food of the people was the first and most urgent subject for their consideration. If they opened to the people of this country the markets of the world, they would educate themselves, and all the blessings which were anticipated from education would follow; but if they thought that they could elevate the moral condition of the people, while their physical condition was depressed, they laboured under a great error. As to the coming harvest, the anticipations regarding it gave rise to reflections which bore not on the present moment so particularly as on the whole policy of the system of the Corn Laws. A foreign corn trade was a legitimate pursuit, and the Government had no right to throw any obstacle or hindrance in its way. The present Corn Laws were most especially pernicious, because they were most calculated to prevent their having large stocks of corn held by capitalists, which would be their resource in the event of a bad harvest. Under a free trade in corn, they would have large stocks of corn held by merchants, who would receive corn as a regular commercial return; and the country would thus have a palliative and remedy for a deficient harvest. As to the article of indigo, they had in hand what was equal to a year's consumption, if there should be a sufficient supply; but what was their stock of corn? They had six days' consumption in bond. This was the state of things; and, for the purpose of making corn-growing more profitable to a certain class in this country, they persevered in what he must call a shabby and mean system. It was a humiliating thing to find the leading gentry in this country supporting a principle by which the people of this country were precluded from buying their food at any shop but their own, and telling them that this system was grounded on reasons of State policy. The Corn Laws were maintained for the purpose of swelling the emoluments of those who held land, at the expense of those who did not, and for preventing the manufacturer and the merchant from competing with the agriculturist; they were nothing but a monopoly, of an oppressive, a mean, unjust, and a shabby character. He was neither for fixed duties nor sliding scales, and he hoped that no time would be lost in abolishing entirely the duty on corn. The Corn Laws could not be maintained on the ground that they were necessary for State policy. The hon. Gentleman concluded by cautioning hon. Gentlemen opposite against telling the farmers that they had pledges from Ministers that the Corn Laws would be maintained. The Government were perfectly free to repeal the Corn Law next Session if they should choose to do so.

Mr. Darby said, that if the hon. Gentlemen begged of them not to go down to the country and say that the Government had pledged themselves to maintain the Corn Laws, he would, in return, request the hon. Gentleman not to say that Government did intend to alter the Corn Laws. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton said, he hoped the Ministers would declare their thoughts on this subject. He should have thought that the hon. Gentleman did not want to be enlightened on it. The hon. Gentleman dealt a great deal in prophecy, but he had never known one of his prophecies to turn out true. The hon. Gentleman frequently declared in 1841, that trade would never revive in consequence of the Corn Laws; whereas now he told them that capital was never so abundant, that production was never so great, and that steam engines were never so busy. Yet all this was done in the face of the Corn Law. The hon. Gentleman talked of the quantity of corn in bond, and made the starvation of the country depend on it; but he would ask the hon. Gentleman if he had ascertained the quantity in the country—did he know the quantity of free stock and the quantity of home-grown corn in the country at the present moment? The hon. Gentleman knew nothing of the subject, and he only hoped he would not alarm the country by his speech. He also had the pleasure of telling the hon. Gentleman that the glass was for some days rising. He had, he regretted to say, seen a sort of fiendish delight on the part of some at the bad weather. If they were to have bad weather, they must meet it with becoming resignation; but he could only pity those who rejoiced in it as a means of carrying out their views with respect to the Corn Laws. His opinion was that, with bad harvests, this country would be ten times worse without the Corn Law than with it. Were it not for the Corn Law, such a breadth of wheat would not be sown in the country as was sown last year. He believed that merchants had been purchasing home-grown corn under the operation of those laws. In spite of the rain and the bad weather, corn was not so dear as the hon. Gentleman would have wished. If the views of the hon. Gentlemen had been carried out, the prospects of the country would be ten times worse than at present.

Mr. Sheil said, that he was sure that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton most sincerely prayed that all the arguments which he could adduce in support of his views, with respect to the Corn Laws, might not derive fearful corroboration from the calamities which would be inflicted upon the country by a bad harvest. The right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government had been seconded in all his efforts by a cycle of good harvests. He agreed with hon. Gentlemen who asserted that the Corn Laws were matters of paramount importance. Ireland, although the land of difficulty, should not entirely en gross the attention of the House. His noble Friend commenced with Ireland, and terminated with Ireland. That was not unnatural, because Ireland was a subject which pressed upon every public man, an exclusive subject of consideration not unfrequently in the Cabinet; and he was sure that there was no subject which engaged the solicitude of the right hon. Gentleman opposite more than Ireland, which did not now, however, present as pleasing a prospect as he could desire to have offered to his contemplation. He was not at that late hour of the night going into all the topics which had been adverted to by his noble Friend. But there was a measure of the Government to which he felt it his duty to advert, and it did the greatest credit to the Government that they passed it, and he trusted that they would make it a model measure. It was a measure which Her Majesty's Government might take as a pattern by which their future legislation in respect to Ireland should be regulated. It was a measure valuable in itself, and more so in view of the results to which it was likely to lead. With respect to their measure for academic instruction, he did not set the same value upon it as he did upon the Maynooth Bill. It would turn out not to be so satisfactory to the people of Ireland. The Government should have consulted the Catholic bishops, before they determined upon it; and he would take that occasion to tell them, that as long as they allowed Trinity College to remain in the enjoyment of a prosperity connected with Protestant ascendancy, so long would the Irish people be discontented with any system of education which the Government might devise, and so long would a suspicion of the intentions of the Government be entertained by the Catholics of Ireland. He had no doubt that the Academic Bill had been conceived by the Government from the very best motives, and with the very best objects in view; but he did not think that their intentions in this respect had been as prosperous in their execution as they were beneficial in their original design. They were opposed, as to that measure by the Catholic clergy of Ireland, and he was much afraid that their opposition would continue. He would now say a few words only upon the Registration Bill, not so much for the purpose of retrospective condemnation, as for the purpose of suggesting the course which, in his opinion, the Government should in future adopt. The registry in Ireland had almost disappeared. It was becoming "fine by degrees, and beautifully less." In the county of Tipperary, with its large population, the registry had fallen down to the small number of 4,000. In Waterford, with a population of 150,000, the registry did not exceed 500. And how had this state of things been brought about? Why, because the Government had kept the people in suspense on the subject ever since they had come into office. Men were careless or indifferent on account of this very suspense about the registry, because no man was sure that, after having placed himself upon it, his vote would remain upon the registry. These were great evils, and if the right hon. Baronet told his friends before he came into office, to "register, register, register," he must say that he should give them—his political antagonists—the opportunity of applying also that great instrument, of the effects of which the right hon. Baronet had had, so far as he himself was concerned, so favourable an experience. It was intimated that the object of the Bill in contemplation would be to put the two countries upon a footing of equality. Did that mean that the Govern ment had it in contemplation to restore the 40*s.* franchise in fee? They contem plated formerly a 5*l.* franchise; that was a part of their former project. Such a franchise did not exist here. He did not want a restoration of the 40*s.* freehold for life in Ireland, for that was impracticable. What he wished to see established was a 40*s.* freehold in fee. If they were ready to give the Irish a franchise, embracing 5*l.* in fee, why not, on the same principle, give them one embracing a 40*s.* freehold in fee? Suppose a man had land worth 40*s.* for ever, and built a house upon that land, why should not that man have a vote? By giving such a franchise to Ireland, all the difficulties which arose from the 40*s.* freehold, as it formerly existed, would be set at rest. The Chandos Clause was to be deprecated. If they gave the tenant at will a vote, the tenant would, in times of tranquillity, be the mere slave and tool of the landlord; and in times of insurrection and disturbance, he would be found a fitting instrument for increasing confusion and perpetrating strife. They had it in their power to induce the landlords to make leases, by depriving the landlords who did not of a variety of advantages which he now enjoyed in the enforcement of rent. He believed that there was at one time an intention, on the part of the Commissioners, who investigated into the relations subsisting between landlords and tenants in Ireland, to recommend that the landlords be compelled to make leases. This they afterwards abandoned, thinking that it would be too great an infringement of the rights of property. If they took away the power of distress from the landlord—if they required him to give one or two years to quit—if they made him liable to account with his tenant, when improvements had been made upon his property, they would thereby embarrass tenancy at will to such an extent, that they would hold out the strongest inducements to the landlord to grant leases. Almost all the evils of Ireland arose from the one source of insecurity of tenure. He thought that to destroy this source by having leases granted for thirty-one years, would remedy half the evils to which the country was now subject. If leases for thirty-one years were adopted, the tenant would have the advantage of the capital, which he might employ in improvements, for a just and reasonable time, at the expiration of which period there need be no account with the landlord, much good would result; but if they adopted instead, the system recommended and proposed by Lord Stanley, they would do nothing but introduce fresh elements of confusion, which would assuredly add to the calamities of Ireland. He took the liberty of making these suggestions, with a view to the proper fashioning of the Bill, which the Government had it in contemplation, as it appeared, to introduce next Session. Ireland had reason to expect much from the Government, for they had made announcements with respect to the government of Ireland of the most important character. Indeed there were acknowledgments, if not promises, made by the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Treasury, which might be regarded as great political events. He had declared that it was of the utmost importance to conciliate Ireland—that Ireland could not be governed by force—and that in Ireland the efficacy of the trial by jury was not to be relied upon. These declarations on the part of the right hon. Baronet he regarded as equivalent to measures, because they were declarations which must be followed up. How were they to be followed up? He thought that it was a great misfortune to the present Government, and one of the chief sources, perhaps, of their difficulties, that eight millions of the people of Ireland were entirely beyond the pale of the patronage of the Crown. The patronage of the Church, and the patronage of the State, did not exercise any great influence over the great mass of the people of Ireland—600,000*l.* of the public property circulated amongst the Protestant ecclesiastics of the country. The patronage of the State was monopolized by the same class as monopolized the patronage of the Church. That was not the case under the predecessors in office of Her Majesty's present advisers. The patronage of the State was then distributed between Catholics and Protestants. Under the former Government they had a Catholic Chief Baron, a Catholic Master of the Rolls, a Catholic Attorney and Solicitor General, a Catholic Vice President of the Board of Trade—they had Catholic Lords of the Treasury—and several of the great offices in Ireland were filled by Catholics. In addition to this, the minor patronage of the Crown in Ireland was widely diffused between the adherents of the two creeds, and produced a signally beneficial operation upon the country. But what was the case now—what was the course pursued by the present Government? He did not find that a single individual, with the exception of his learned Friend Mr. Sergeant Howley, a man of the highest merit, with this exception, he did not find that a single Roman Catholic had in Ireland been promoted to a situation of importance. An office at the disposal of Government, connected with the Board of Bequests, had been given to a Catholic, it was true; but that could scarcely be adduced as an exception to his charge. He now called upon the Government to fulfil the engagements into which they entered when they came into office—those engagements which they solemnly contracted when they said that between the Protestant and Catholic an equality should be maintained. Indeed, he believed that he was not misrepresenting the language of the right hon. Baronet opposite, when he reminded the House that the right hon. Baronet said, that if a Catholic and a Protestant were candidates for the same office in Ireland, he would prefer the Catholic. How had that declaration been carried out? It was to but a very small body of the Irish people that their patronage extended. He defied the right hon. Gentleman to contend that his declaration had been carried out; for the whole practice of the present Government with regard to State patronage in Ireland had been in direct opposition to it. Reference had been made to the ecclesiastical institutions of the country. He lamented the decision to which the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary had come with respect to the Established Church in Ireland. Any man who looked at Ireland at the present moment, and saw the agitation, which had not yet subsided —the monster meetings, which were but the symptoms of the distemper, had ceased it was true, but the distemper itself was as virulent and active as ever—must most deeply lament the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman. He said nothing, however, on the important point of the conciliation of the Catholic clergy. He (Mr. Sheil) thought that there were means, which might be readily adopted, by which the State might expend money for the purposes of the Church, and yet preserve the independence of the clergy. He saw no difficulty in the Government granting money for the purpose of building churches, for purchasing glebes, and erecting glebe houses, nor did he see any in giving proper dignity and rank to the Catholic clergy. It was deeply to be deplored that the Government, when engaged with the Maynooth measure, did not make it larger than it was. They would not then have found that they would have had any more difficulties to encounter in carrying the measure—which he would not, on the whole, call a small one, but which, he contended, might and should have been made much larger—than they experienced with it in its present shape. The right hon. Baronet was conscious of all the difficulties with which he was beset; he ought also to be aware of the many and great advantages with which he was surrounded. In addition to the power which he could command upon other points, he possessed great power upon Irish questions, from the assistance and sustainment which he received from hon. Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side of the House. He must also be aware of the circumstances which conspired to make him almost, as to these questions, omnipotent. Let him remember how the Catholic question was carried. It was carried by the impracticability of forming what was then called a Protestant Cabinet. In this respect the right hon. Gentleman was now in a similar situation to that in which the Government was placed in 1829. If he had determined to bring forward a larger measure of conciliation, and his party had abandoned him in so doing, and he and the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department had resigned office together upon the subject, he (Mr. Sheil) believed that it would have been found impossible to form a Government on the principle opposed to that upon which the right hon. Gentleman had retired. That was their great source of strength, and they should have boldly and manfully acted upon it. Not long ago the right hon. Gentleman said that there was no sacrifice which he was not prepared to make for Ireland, with a view to confer peace and tranquillity upon that distracted country. He (Mr. Sheil) wanted no sacrifice of principle on the part of the right hon. Gentleman—he would exact no self-immolation from him. All that he wanted at the right hon. Baronet's hands was justice to Ireland, in its broad and legitimate sense, and that he should, in measuring out that justice to her, introduce measures to Parliament of which the failure would not be discreditable, and of which the success would be attended with the most beneficial results.

Motion agreed to.

TOBACCO TRADE.] Mr. Sheridan called the attention of the House to the petition of Richard and James Keynes, grocers of Shaftesbury, which had been printed, and advertised, the circumstances of which they complained. It appeared that these persons, in prosecuting their regular trade, received a cask of tobacco which was regularly invoiced to them, and which had not been in their possession half an hour before it was seized by the Excise Officers, upon the plea that the tobacco was adulterated. The Report of the Committee on the tobacco trade, had shown the extreme difficulty that existed on the part of the most scientific and expert chemists to detect adulteration in tobacco; he thought, therefore, that this was a hard case, and he would move for a Select Committee to inquire into the subject.

Mr. Cardwell observed that the person from whom the petitioners had received the tobacco had been recently proceeded against by the Excise, and incurred heavy penalties. The suspicions of the Excise were, consequently, excited, and they made the seizure. They continued to be of opinion that the tobacco was adulterated. Not, however, suspecting any fraud on the part of the petitioner, they gave notice that it was not their intention to proceed for penalties, but that they could not allow it to be sold as genuine tobacco, and therefore should proceed for its condemnation. The petitioners had, therefore, everything that was necessary for the vindication of their character. As to the analysis, the difficulty of proof rested with the Excise. The officers of revenue had done precisely that which was their duty—they had prevented adulterated tobacco being innocently sold as genuine tobacco, and the petitioners had received every reparation which their character could require in being exonerated from the penalties.

Mr. Hume thought the proceedings in this case, as in all connected with tobacco, were most disgraceful, and such as could not take place in any other country. Persons whose families had been in the business for centuries were preparing to leave it, because an honest man found it utterly impossible to carry it on with any profit. The only remedy to be applied was a large reduction of the duty.

Motion withdrawn.

House adjourned at half past one o'clock, till Friday.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Her Majesty's Visit to Germany.] Lord Campbell: I rise to put a question of great constitutional importance, of which I have given notice, to my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, connected with Her Majesty's approaching visit to Germany. No one in Her Majesty's dominions would wish to interpose any impediment in the way of that visit. There is no longer any foundation for the jealousy which induced Parliament to provide, by the Act of Settlement, that the Sovereign should not leave the kingdom without the consent of both Houses: we have upon the Throne a Queen born and bred in England, and fortunately without any foreign dominions which do not belong to the British Crown; nor is there now any reason to dread the meetings of Sovereigns, which it was formerly said, with too much truth, boded no good to their subjects. At the present day such meetings may have a strong tendency to preserve the tranquillity of Europe. It is perhaps to be regretted that George III., during a very long life and very long reign, was never out of England, nor indeed more than one hundred miles from the place of his birth; if he had visited the flourishing provinces on the banks of the Rhine, which Her Majesty is said to be going to survey, and had seen how harmoniously and happily men of different religions there live with equal rights under the same Government, he might have been less adverse to the emancipation of his Roman Catholic subjects. No one, therefore, can feel regret that Her Majesty, if she so wills, should for a short time be absent from England. If circumstances had permitted, I should have rejoiced could the Irish have had the high satisfaction which my countrymen have twice enjoyed, of seeing their beloved Sovereign among them. I do not presume to offer any opinion as to the expediency of deferring this visit, although I cannot doubt that Her Majesty would now be received in Ireland with universal affection and reverence, whatever diversity of opinion there may be respecting the conduct of Her Ministers. But the subject of my question is the exercise of the royal authority during Her Majesty's absence. It has been declared by Parliament to be part of the privileges belonging to the Crown by the Common Law, that our Sovereigns may leave the realm at their pleasure; but, as far as I am aware, the invariable practice has been, that on going abroad they have provided for the exercise of the royal authority during their absence. In the early reigns, the great officers called the "Grand Justiciary" acted as Regent. When that office was abolished, a Regent or Lords Justices were named by the Sovereign on each particular occasion. But I come to the times subsequent to the Revolution. King Edward VI., Queen Mary, Queen Elizabeth, King James I., King Charles I., King Charles II., and King James II., till after his expulsion, never were absent from England from the time when they mounted the Throne. But after the Revolution, down to the reign of George III., cases of the absence of the Sovereign were frequent. King William III., as is well known, went abroad yearly to fight his campaigns, and to carry on his negotiations. While his Consort Queen Mary lived she acted in his absence as Regent; for although she was Queen Regent, yet the Act of Parliament passed at the Revolution prevented her taking any share in the Government. After her death he yearly appointed Lords Justices, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Lord Chancellor being placed at the head of the Commission, and the Princess Anne of Denmark, though the heiress to the Crown, not being included in it. The Session of Parliament was then brought to a conclusion in the spring, and the King generally announced his intentions in the following form:—

"The circumstances of affairs making it necessary for me to be out of the kingdom for some time, I shall take care to leave the administration of the Government, during my absence, in the hands of such persons as I can depend upon."

The prospect of the family of Hanover—possessed of foreign dominions—succeeding, induced the introduction of the clause into the Act of Settlement to which I alluded:—

"That no person who shall hereafter come to the possession of this Crown, shall go out of the dominions of England, Scotland, or Ireland, without consent of Parliament."

But this was immediately repealed on the accession of George I., the Statute 1 Geo. 1. c. 51, reciting—

"That it is agreeable to the ancient Constitution of these kingdoms, that the person of the King or Queen should freely enjoy all and every the just and undoubted rights, liberties, and privileges of the Crown."

Among which must be considered the power of leaving the realm at pleasure. George I. exercised this right in 1716, and intimated his intention of going abroad in his Speech at the close of the Session. He said—

"I design in the approaching recess to visit my dominions in Germany, and I have provided for the peace and security of the kingdom during my absence by constituting my beloved son the Prince of Wales guardian of the realm."

There afterwards arose an unfortunate misunderstanding between the Prince of Wales and the King, and on subsequent occasions the Prince was not so appointed, but the King always nominated Lords Justices. In 1719, George I. being about again to visit Germany, a Commission was issued under the Great Seal, by which thirteen Lords Justices were appointed, and the King made a declaration to the following effect in the Privy Council:—

"May 9, 1719.—His Majesty in Council this day declaring his intention of going out of the kingdom for a short time, was pleased to approve of the annexed draft of a Commission for the administration of the Government during His Majesty's absence. It is ordered by His Majesty in Council that one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State do prepare a warrant for His Majesty's royal signature, in order to the passing of the said Commission under the Great Seal of Great Britain."

Another declaration a little varying from this, occurs in 1723:—

"May 26.—His Majesty in Council this day declaring his intention of going out of the kingdom for a short time, was pleased to nominate the Archbishop of Canterbury. &c., to be Lords Justices for the administration of the Government during his absence and Commission ordered."

On the accession of George II., as long as Queen Caroline lived, on the King going abroad, she was left Regent. I give, as an instance, the entry in the Privy Council books, May 16, 1735:—

"His Majesty in Council was this day pleased to declare that he intended to visit his dominions in Germany; and that he had appointed his dearest Consort the Queen, to be Regent during His Majesty's absence."

A Commission to that effect accordingly passed the Great Seal. After the death of Queen Caroline, as often as the King went abroad, he appointed Lords Justices, like George I., and he usually announced his intention to Parliament. So things went on till his death; and I believe I may venture to say, that he never was absent for any period, long or short, without either appointing a Regent or Lords Justices. In the long reign of George III. it is well known that the Sovereign never was absent from England. George IV. went abroad once, and, I believe, once only, when the same course was pursued. I read the entry from the books of the Privy Council:—

"September 17, 1821.—His Majesty, in Council, was this day pleased to declare his intention of going out of the kingdom for a short time, whereupon the annexed draft of a blank Commission, for appointing Guardians and Justices for the administration of the Government during His Majesty's absence, was read at the board and approved. And his Majesty was farther pleased to declare and nominate the following persons to be the said Guardians and Justices, viz.:—Duke of York, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and other great Officers of State appointed."

Now, after these uniform precedents, from the most ancient times down to the present day, I humbly apprehend that Her Majesty should be advised to appoint Lords Justices to exercise the Royal authority during her absence from the country. I am not aware of any change of circumstances that can authorize a change of practice. Railroads, it is true, have been introduced; but railroads cannot alter the Constitution. Various circumstances may arise in which it may be indispensably necessary that the Royal authority should be exercised, and when there may be no opportunity for the personal exercise of that authority by Her Majesty during her absence. I may refer to the pardon of criminals, and other matters with respect to which great public inconvenience may result from the want of the exercise of the Royal authority. But there is another reason which makes it expedient, in my opinion, to appoint Lords Justices during Her Majesty's absence. I am a lover of limited monarchy, as the form of government which gives the greatest influence to enlightened public opinion, and as best calculated for the prosperity and happiness of this Empire. I should not like to see the Royal authority in abeyance for any period; and it seems to me inconsistent with the monarchical principle, that the country should be left for any period without the means of exercising the Royal authority, as occasion may require. Of course it is the prerogative of Her Majesty to select of her free will whomsoever she may choose to represent her, and to govern in her name. Dutifully and loyally expressing an ardent wish for Her Majesty's happiness while she is abroad, and for her safe return to her dominions; I conclude by asking the question, whether it is not the intention that Lords Justices should be appointed during Her Majesty's absence?

The Lord Chancellor acknowledged the courtesy of his noble and learned Friend in having given him notice of his intention to ask this question. He had not, however, given him notice of his intention to discuss how far going up the Rhine might have modified the religious and political opinions of George III., and he should not, therefore, enter upon that question. He would give a distinct and short answer to the question which had been put to him by his noble and learned Friend. It was not the intention of the Government to advise Her Majesty to issue a Commission appointing Lords Justices during Her absence while on the short tour She was about to make. On a former occasion, previous to Her Majesty's visit to the King of the French, the law officers of the Crown of that time, the present Chief Baron and the late Sir William Follett, were consulted on this point, and they were clearly of opinion, after considering the subject with great deliberation, that it was by no means necessary in point of law that such appointment should take place; and he had then entirely concurred with them in opinion. The opinion of the present law officers of the Crown had also been taken on the subject, and they were entirely of the same opinion; and he also, on a review of the subject, concurred with them that in point of law the appointment of Lords Justices was not necessary. The question, therefore, resolved itself into one of expediency; and in the present state of the country, and with the facilities of communication at present existing, it was considered equally unnecessary and inexpedient to issue such a Commission as his noble and learned Friend had adverted to. Her Majesty, as his noble and learned Friend had stated, had as free a right to visit the Continent as any of her subjects; and any act which She could do as Sovereign, would have as much validity and effect if done on the Continent of Europe as if done in Her own dominions. It should be borne in mind, too, that Her Majesty would be accompanied by a Secretary of State, and that she could return from the furthest point to which she was going in the short period of two days. It was, therefore, quite unnecessary that a Commission should be appointed to exercise the Royal authority during Her Majesty's absence. His noble and learned Friend had referred to precedents; but they did not appear to have any application to the present state of circumstances. In every instance to which his noble and learned Friend had adverted, the Sovereign went to the Continent for the purpose of residing for a considerable time.

Lord Campbell: It is stated in the Commissions that the absence from this country was to be for a short time.

The Lord Chancellor; Yes; in all the Commissions those words "short time," were introduced; but it was matter of fact and matter of history, that on all the occasions to which his noble and learned Friend had referred, the intention of the Sovereign (and that intention was carried into execution) was to remain for some considerable period of time on the Continent, or to transact there some matter of business, either military or civil, which might have extended to a considerable period of time. Let their Lordships take into consideration the actual condition of the Continent at that time, and the means of communication then existing. Most of the cases to which his noble and learned Friend had referred were cases of the Sovereign going to Hanover, a journey which at that time might have occupied eight or ten days. It was therefore necessary, under these circumstances, that, as a matter of convenience, some power should have been given to persons in this country to exercise some of the functions of Royalty during the absence of the Sovereign. His noble and learned Friend had talked of the Royal authority being in abeyance during Her Majesty's absence, unless Lords Justices should be appointed by Commission; but, as his noble and learned Friend had doubtless examined the Commissions to which he had referred, he must be aware that they were all subject to restrictions; and if he had looked to those restrictions, he would have found that they pared down the authority in so many important particulars, that it was in reality rendered merely nominal; so that upon all important occasions, it would be necessary to have immediate and personal communication with the Sovereign. Considering, then, the altered state of circumstances—considering that the tour which Her Majesty was about to take, was circumscribed in its limits, and would last but for a short time—considering, too, that Her Majesty was to be accompanied by a Secretary of State; and that communication between Her Majesty and this country would be most easy, whenever it might be necessary, it had been thought quite unnecessary to appoint such a Commission as his noble and learned Friend had directed their Lordships' attention to. It was on these grounds, that it had not been thought necessary to advise Her Majesty to go through the form of appointing a cumbrous Commission, really for no practical purpose.

Lord Campbell said, that his noble and learned Friend had entirely passed over the precedent of George IV., in 1821.

The Lord Chancellor said, he had not passed it over. That was a visit of six or seven weeks, at a time when the communication with Hanover occupied eight or nine days, and perhaps ten.

Lord Campbell would not longer argue the question; but would only observe, that his noble and learned Friend had not cited one instance in favour of the course which the Government proposed to follow, and which introduced an innovation in the practice of the Constitution.

Subject dropped.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, August 8, 1845.

Minutes.] New Writs. For Belfast, v. Sir James Emerson Tennent, Chiltern Hundreds.—For Cirencester, v. William Cripps, Esq. Commissioner of the Treasury.—For Linlithgowshire, v. Hon. Charles Hope, Governor of the Isle of Man.—For Borough of Warwick, v. Sir Charles Douglas, Commissioner of Greenwich Hospital.—For Sunderland, v. Viscount Howick, now Earl Grey.

Bills. Public.—1°. Poor Removal; Waste Lands (Australia) (No. 2).

3°. and passed:—Silk Weavers.

Private.—Reported.—London and York Railway (Sheffield Branch).

Petitions Presented. By Sir H. Douglas, from Liverpool, for a Change of Policy towards New Zealand.—By Mr. Hindley, from Ashford, against Charitable Trusts Bill.—By Mr. Hindley, from Factory Workers employed in several places, in favour of the Ten Hours System in Factories.

Silk Weavers.] Sir G. Clerk, in moving the Order of the Day for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Third Reading of the Silk Weavers Bill, observed, that the debate on this question had been adjourned, as it seemed to be doubted whether silk weavers came properly under the Arbitration Act. There could be no doubt that they did, as the object of the Arbitration Act was to extend to the silk trade, the provisions of that Act. The object of this Bill, therefore, was to introduce some few amendments into the silk trade, which had been introduced into the hosiery trade. That a bargain and contract between master and workmen should be reduced to writing, and a copy kept by each. The Bill met with the approbation of all the workmen, and many of the principal masters. It would prevent the litigation formerly so prevalent between those parties. He hoped, under these circumstances, the House would pass the Bill.

Bill read a third time and passed.

Waste Lands (Australia).] Mr. G. W. Hope trusted that he would be permitted to move for leave to bring in the Bill relative to the Waste Lands of Australia, of which he had given notice. His only object in so doing was to have the Bill printed for circulation, in the form in which it was proposed to have it amended had it gone into Committee. He was anxious, by now bringing it in, to place it in its amended form before the House and the public.

Motion agreed to. Bill brought in, read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

North American Boundary Line.] Sir Howard Douglas, referring to the Papers recently laid before the House, explanatory of the proceedings of the Commission under the direction of Lieutenant Colonel Estcourt, engaged in laying down the Boundary Line, as established by the Treaty of Washington, between the British Provinces of Canada and New Brunswick, and the United States, would take that oppportunity of expressing, in strong terms, the satisfaction with which he had read those proofs of the ability, intelligence, and energy, displayed by Lieutenant Colonel Estcourt and his party, in exploring, cutting out, tracing on the ground, and determining, astronomically, the several portions and stations of a frontier, extending over no less than 526 miles, in great part through the virgin tangled forest; by which uncommon exertions, and extraordinary activity, that important service had been so far effectually executed, as to show that it would speedily be brought to completion; and thus evince the real economy of having provided that intelligent, scientific, and excellent officer, with a staff, and means of execution, sufficient to enable him to act with his well-known intelligence and vigour.

New Zealand.] Mr. J. A. Smith asked whether the right hon. Baronet had any objection to lay on the Table, before the House separated, the recent correspondence between the Colonial Office and the New Zealand Company? He trusted he might be permitted, to express the great satisfaction he felt that the term was approaching to those very disagreeable discussions which had lately taken place between the Secretary for the Colonies and the Company. It was certainly true that the whole had not been obtained which the Company thought to be their right, and also to be essential to the good government of the Colony of New Zealand; but he could not forget that, after what had occurred, a certain degree of sacrifice on both sides was necessary, and he did hail with great satisfaction the tone and temper exhibited by the Colonial Office in these transactions; and he thought that that tone and temper were more important than the results themselves. He, therefore, begged to thank the Government for the part they had recently taken in this matter. He was exceedingly glad to find that, with the power with which the noble Lord at the head of the Colonial Office was armed, he had felt how graceful any concession must be coming from him. Before he sat down, he must advert to one point which had purposely been left by the Company till the close of these discussions—a point which was important to the Company here, and not without its importance to the prosperity of the Colony—he alluded to the application which had been made by the New Zealand Company for a loan of money from the Government on the security of their land. He was perfectly aware that the application must be considered by the Government on public grounds, and he was perfectly willing that it should be so considered; but, at the same time, he hoped the Government would state that the application should receive consideration without delay, and would also answer it without any greater delay than necessary. He thought the conduct of the New Zealand Company in this matter was a proof that their more immediate interests had been postponed to what they considered as more the interests of the public; and that would be an answer, he hoped, and the best answer, to the taunt that had been thrown out, as to a cross having taken place between the Government and the Company. He begged to add, that the success of this application was indispensable, to enable the Company to resume its operations as a colonizing body; and indispensable, in his opinion, to the harmonious working of the arrangement which had just taken place.

Sir R. Peel: I do not think it necessary for me to assure the House, that the recent harmonious understanding between the Colonial Office and the New Zealand Company, must have been to me a subject of great satisfaction; but I am bound to state, and I do thus publicly state, that whatever credit is due for these improved relations, must be given to my noble Friend. I said some time ago, that whatever might be the differences between my noble Friend and the New Zealand Company, it would be found that my noble Friend was not influenced by them. I am certain that my noble Friend's past conduct in this matter, was guided by public considerations; and I am certain that his future conduct will be guided by public considerations also. The correspondence that formerly took place between him and the New Zealand Company, would not, I was sure, have the slightest influence on his mind, or prevent him from dispassionately taking into view the whole circumstances of the case; and in all that I formerly said on this subject, I spoke with the entire concurrence of my noble Friend. For the purpose of conducting the late negotiations, a gentleman was nominated, who has not been mixed up with these transactions; and was, therefore, enabled to take a more dispassionate view of the whole case—I allude to that most distinguished public officer, Mr. Lefevre. He was called on to assist my hon. Friend near me, the Under Secretary for the Colonies, in this negotiation; and he was employed by my noble Friend, in concert with my hon. Friend, to conduct the arrangement which has just been completed with the New Zealand Company. With respect to the general allusion which the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down made to the satisfactory conclusion of these negotiations, it confirms that which I stated from the first, that my noble Friend was acting, in all that he did, only on public grounds. With respect to the charge, that a "cross" had taken place between the Government and the New Zealand Company, I think that no man, who is acquainted with the respective parties, would imagine such a thing could be possible. No secret understanding of any kind has been entered into, on the part of the Government, with the New Zealand Company. If any such proposition had been made to my noble Friend, it would have met with an indignant refusal. As to the application for a loan, the hon. Gentleman must excuse me if I decline to give him any definite answer. If he asks me, if the application shall receive the consideration of the Government, I have no difficulty in assuring him that the Government will give an early consideration to the subject; but the consideration of a thing by the Government, is generally understood to mean a favourable consideration. Now, I cannot say anything of that kind. The consideration that the Government will give to the subject, is not to be understood as being fettered in any way. Of course, nothing could be done without the consent of Parliament. If the Government came to the conclusion during the recess, that the loan ought to be granted, they could only give an assurance subject to the consent of Parliament; they could give no conclusive answer, unless with the concurrence of Parliament. The hon. Gentleman must excuse me, therefore, if I do not answer that question. The Government cannot be understood as being fettered in any way; at the same time, the hon. Gentleman must not draw any conclusion unfavourable to the application, from what I have stated.

Subject at an end.

The Dismissal of Mr. Watson.] Colonel Verner said, he should not be discharging his duty to the Protestants of Ulster, if he did not put a question to the right hon. Baronet, to know whether the report was true, as stated in the papers, that Mr. Watson had been deprived of the commission of the peace and the situation of a deputy lieutenant of the county of Antrim, in consequence of taking part in an Orange procession on the 12th of July last?

Sir R. Peel said, it was true that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had felt it to be his painful duty to remove Mr. Watson from the commission of the peace and the deputy lieutenancy. That report was correct. In 1837 (he thought it was) the House of Commons resolved to present an Address to King William IV., praying him to adopt all the necessary measures for the purpose of discouraging Orange societies. That Address was presented to the Sovereign, and a solemn promise was made by the Sovereign that every measure in his power for the purpose of discouraging Orange societies should be dopted. That was the obligation that had been contracted by the Crown. He (Sir R. Peel) understood that this gentleman, who was of the highest respectability, not only had interfered in an Orange procession, but had (being a magistrate and deputy lieutenant) signed, as chairman of a meeting, resolutions which stated that the time was come when Orange institutions ought to be reorganized. On this, bearing in mind the sentiments expressed in the Address of the House in 1837, and bearing in mind the reply of the Sovereign, that the whole power of the Government should be employed for the purpose of discouraging Orange societies, Her Majesty's Government had found it to be their painful duty, in fulfilling the assurances that had been given from the Throne, to acquaint Mr. Watson that he could no longer continue in the commission.

Colonel Verner said, that as the answer of the right hon. Baronet was not satisfactory, he should move an Address to the Queen, on the subject of the removal of Mr. Watson next Session.

Syria.] Viscount Palmerston: I gave notice of my intention merely to make some observations upon the affairs of Syria, believing that there would be some Motion before the House to which my observations might be appended; but as I now find that there is no Motion before the House, it is necessary for me to make a specific Motion, for the purpose of enabling the right hon. Gentleman to make such statements as he may deem proper; and, therefore, with the permission of the House, although I have not given notice of my intention to do so, I shall move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for copies or extracts of correspondence relative to the affairs of Syria, in continuation of those already presented to the House. It is not my intention to occupy for any length of time the attention of the House; but, it is my wish, before Parliament separates, to draw the attention of the House and of the Government to two points which are embraced in the Papers that have been laid before us. The House is aware that when, in 1840 and 1841, the Allies thought it necessary to take steps to restore Syria to the direct authority of the Sultan, that part of Syria which is commonly called "The Mountain," which, in fact, consists of the highlands of Lebanon, was governed by the late Emir Beschir Shebab. He was then enlisted in the interests of Mehemet Ali. He was summoned to return to the allegiance of his proper Sovereign; and delays occurring in his compliance with that summons, a specific time was named, within which he was to return to his allegiance, or to be deposed, and have a successor appointed in his room. The late Emir Beschir did not comply with that summons made to him in the name and authority of his Sovereign. He was deposed—and deposed by British officers, acting under authority given to them by the Sultan; and in his stead was appointed a relative of his, the late Emir Beschir el Kassim, who was then holding no public situation, but living at the head of his clan and family. The Emir Beschir el Kassim continued to exercise the authority belonging to his appointment for, I think, something rather more than a twelvemonth; but in the beginning of 1842, or at the end of 1841, in consequence of the civil war that broke out between the Druses and the Maronites, the Emir Beschir el Kassim was besieged in his residence at Deir-el-Kamar. He was called down by the Governor of Sidon, was found to be incompetent from age and infirmities to carry on the difficult government of the Lebanon, was deposed, and was afterwards sent to Asia Minor. On his passage from Deir-el-Kamar to Beyrout, in obedience to the orders of the Turkish Governor, he was plundered by the Druses of all the property he had intended to carry with him, and his own house, with all that was in it, was afterwards burnt by the Druses. The Emir Beschir el Kassim claims from the Turkish Government payment of his salary for the period during which he administered the affairs of the Lebanon. He claimed also compensation for losses by the plunder to which he was exposed in his journey down to the coast, and for lands of which he had been deprived when the disturbances took place. These claims were admitted to be, to a certain extent, founded on fair and just grounds. In the firman given to him, it was declared that a grant should be made to the amount to which he is entitled. Although his claim is thus admitted, yet he has not been able to obtain any payment whatever. Now, I consider that the British Government is bound in honour to see that claim discharged, at least such part of it as can be properly substantiated. It was by officers of the British Government, acting under the authority of the Sultan, that he was induced to accept the appointment of Emir Bechir. In accepting it he certainly rendered an important service; in consequence of taking that appointment he suffered greatly; and, therefore, care ought to be taken that he should receive just compensation. If he had remained a private individual, in no commanding office, he might, in all probability, have retained possession of the property of which he was master at the time. I must say, that on the perusal of the last set of Papers which have been laid before Parliament on this subject, it does not appear to me that Her Majesty's Government have shown the energy which they ought to have displayed in obtaining for this individual the compensation to which he has just claims. After a long correspondence, an instruction has been given to our Ambassador at Constantinople by no means sufficient, considering the just influence that in this matter we are entitled to exercise. The instruction I refer to is dated January 29, 1845:—

"With reference to my despatch of the 20th July last, I transmit to your Excellency herewith a copy of the letter which he has addressed to Sir Charles Napier, complaining that the firman for his indemnification, a translation of which was contained in your despatch of the 31st December, 1843, has not been carried into effect. I have to instruct your Excellency, should the statements contained in the Emir Beschir's letters prove to be correct, to take such measures as to you may seem most likely to induce the Porte to carry out the terms of the firman in question."

In a matter in which the honour and good faith of the British Government are engaged, it is not enough to tell our Ambassador that which he is bid to do here; the British Government should have sent to Sir Stratford Canning a decided note to be presented in their name, calling upon the Porte to do that which they were justly entitled to expect the Porte would do. That, then, is the first point. It does not appear to me that the British Government have taken with sufficient energy measures to fulfil those engagements which it and the Porte are bound to fulfil. More efficient instructions ought to have been sent, or an urgent note might have been sent to the Ambassador; and not these vague and loose instructions which the British Government have been content with giving. The larger subject is the unfortunate condition in which Syria has of late been placed. I am quite aware that this is a matter attended with considerable difficulty. It is by no means a simple affair. On the one hand, the Government of England, and the Governments of Austria, Russia, and Prussia, who were parties with England to the operations in 1840 and 1841, entered into certain engagements with the people of Syria, which it is essential to their honour to see fulfilled; and, on the other hand, it must be admitted that the fulfilment of these engagements involves a departure from the ordinary rules which guide Governments in their relations with other Powers; because there is not any thing more at variance with international obligations, than that one Power should interfere with another in regard to the manner in which that Power treats its own subjects. It is only in consequence of special circumstances connected with the operations in Syria, that we have a right, or are obliged, to address ourselves to the Sultan with regard to the affairs of Syria. We did contract engagements there which we are bound to fulfil. The object of the Four Powers and of the Sultan, in 1840, was to induce the people of Syria to take up arms against the usurped authority of Mehemet Ali; to declare in favour of their legitimate Sovereign, the Sultan; and to return to that direct allegiance to him which was due to him as their supreme monarch. To effect this object, the Allied Powers had recourse to two methods. First, the Syrians were supplied with arms; and then inducements were held out to them to employ those arms in the service of the Sultan. These inducements consisted in certain promises made by the Sultan, and guaranteed by the Allied Powers. The Sultan's promises were not made through the Turks, but through British naval and diplomatic officers, specially authorized and empowered by the Porte to make these promises; which were, that if they returned to their lawful allegiance, and assisted in expelling the army of Mehemet Ali, they should be relieved from the oppressions they had for several years suffered, and their liberties and privileges should be restored to them. Now, as that has not been done, on that ground the British Government is entitled to take further steps, and, in my opinion, is bound to take those steps. The position of Syria is a very peculiar one. It is not a mere province—it is not inhabited by one race alone, nor by people of one religion alone. The people in the central part of Syria, commonly called the Mountain, the highlands of Lebanon, consist of two different races, professing different religions. First, there are the Maronites, who are a sort of Christians; and, on the other hand, there are the Druses, a sort of Mohammedans; not that they actually belong to the Mussulman faith, but having a faith peculiar to themselves, are yet considered by the Turks as nearly allied to the Mussulman belief. These two races are not separated by any distinct geographical distribution. It is not that in one part of the Lebanon Maronites are to be found, and that the Druses are inhabitants of another. They are not parted from each other as the people of Westmoreland are parted from the people of Cumberland; nor is there any well-defined local distinction in situation between them. The two races are intermixed, though in one part the Maronites predominate, and in another part the Druses. There are portions wherein the Maronites may be found as the proprietors of the soil, and the Druses as the serfs or peasants; and there are others in which the Maronites stand to the Druses in the position in which peasants stood to their lords under the feudal system. In fact, the whole of Syria is organized on the system of a feudal constitution. That system existed when the Emir Beschir was in authority, and the whole country was governed by an officer bearing that title. This created difficulty; for if one man governs the whole province, and if he be, as for a long time happened, not a Turk but a native chief, either Maronite or Druse, he must exercise authority over men of the other creed, as well as over those of his own race, and thus govern at once two populations, who are, moreover, animated with the greatest possible antipathy the one to the other. When, therefore, the late Emir Beschir el Kassim was removed from office, a question arose as to how the Lebanon was to be governed. The Emir Beschir el Kassim belonged to the family of Schehab, a Maronite family, that for a great number of years were princes of the Lebanon. He was an old man, between seventy and eighty years of age—he was infirm, he had a paralytic affection, he was deficient in energy and talent—and he had to perform a difficult task. It was evidently impossible, under him, to preserve the peace of the Lebanon. Where men divided in interest, or strongly opposed in feeling, are separated by position, or prevented by circumstances from coming in constant contact with each other, it is a matter of less difficulty to prevent those feuds which are naturally incident to their social condition and religious differences from assuming the character of religious war; but when such men are intermixed, as they are in the Lebanon, occupying the same village, dwelling on the same land, constantly meeting in the same town, it evidently requires a vigorous hand, a powerful head, a strong, determined will, together with a sound judgment, to repress that tendency to disorder which must exist in such a state of society. When the late Emir Beschir was removed, there appeared to be no member of his family in all respects fit for the government of the Lebanon. There was but one person who could be thought of—that was the Emir Haidar, a man who possessed more education than is generally to be met with in persons of that part of the country—for he was a native of the mountain districts—but at the same time he was not thought altogether fit for the very responsible situation of governor. Then the differences which had arisen between the Druses and the Maronites, and the bloody conflicts that had taken place between those two races, rendered it necessary for the Sultan and the Five Great Powers, who were in communication with him on the subject, to endeavour to make some arrangement that should provide for the better government of that part of Syria, without exposing either the Druses on the one hand, or the Maronites on the other, to the inconvenience of being subject to the dominion of a governor belonging to the rival race. After much communication between them, and after full consideration by, the parties, a plan was proposed in the year 1842, which, I think, was well calculated, had it been carried into effect, to attain the object in view. It was proposed that, instead of one governor, two governors should be appointed; that there should be a Druse governor for the Druses, and a Maronite governor for the Maronites; it was proposed that those two governors should be, of course, subordinate to the Turkish Government, but that each respectively should be the governor of that part of the population to which he by birth and religion belonged. This plan was sufficiently simple as far as it went, but it did not entirely remove the difficulty which arose from the mixed location of the population; and it became a matter of consideration and of some difficulty to decide what should be done as to those villages and districts which were inhabited by Druses and Maronites jointly. An arrangement, however, was proposed which appeared pretty well calculated to overcome even that difficulty; and it was further suggested, as a part of the plan, to guard against oppression and injustice, that permission should be given to the people, whether Druses or Maronites, in those mixed districts, to retire within that part of the province which was administered by a governor of their own race. That is to say, that in a mixed village in which the majority were Maronites and the minority were Druses, the Druses would be permitted to retire to the adjoining district where the government was under the control of a Druse governor. And in the same way, in those villages where the Maronites formed the minority of the population, they might retire and place themselves under the direct rule of a Maronite chief. And it was proposed further, that as this emigration would necessarily be attended with some sacrifices and losses to the people who might avail themselves of the permission, compensation should be made by the Porte for the value of their property, which upon being sold might not realize its proper amount. In favour of this plan the Five Powers appeared to have been unanimous; and when the Five Powers are unanimous in a matter of this kind, it is to be presumed that they are right; and it was natural to expect that their policy, if carried out, would be successful. I say, it may be presumed they are right, because when Five Powers, having such various and conflicting interests as England, France, Austria, Russia, and Prussia, agree to recommend any plan to the Sultan, it is evident it must be founded on a clear understanding of the interests of the Sultan; for no four of the Five Powers would ever concur in a plan adapted to promote the interests of any one of the five, whichsoever that one might be. This plan then, I say, was founded on a right understanding of the interests of the Sultan, and it was a plan which seemed to be easy of execution. It is clear, moreover, from the correspondence we have before us, that it would have accomplished its purpose. It is evident from the Papers on the Table, that if it had been earnestly and sincerely taken up by the Porte—if means had been taken to give the proper compensation to those who might desire to emigrate into a neighbouring district—if the two governors had been appointed, and had received from the Turkish authorities on the coast that support in money for their expenses, and in a small number of troops to maintain their authority, which the Porte ought to have given, that arrangement would have been carried into effect, and by that means the peace of Syria would have been maintained, and the inhabitants of that part of the Turkish Empire would have possessed greater comforts, advantages, and happiness, than the inhabitants of any other part of the dominions of the Porte at this moment enjoy. But although this plan—a plan promising so many and such great advantages—was proposed in the year 1842, it does not appear that up to the present time it has been carried out; but instead of it, we find that constant delays have been interposed by the Turkish authorities, and various pretences have been assigned for not carrying that arrangement into execution. Two very high Turkish officers were sent to Beyrout; but instead of appointing a Maronite governor and a Druse governor, and giving them the money necessary for their expenses, and furnishing them with troops—a small number would have been sufficient—to support their authority, these Turkish officers sent, time after time, to the inhabitants of the different districts to ask them whether the proposed arrangement was agreeable to them; and various objections being made by interested parties, they referred the matter back to Constantinople, and then every possible delay was interposed, every conceivable difficulty was started, and instead of showing an anxiety to carry out the arrangement, the authorities seem to have interposed every obstacle which it was in their power to bring against it; and the result was, that intrigues of all kinds had full scope. The members of the family of Schehab, to which the Emir Beschir belonged, were not so convinced as the Porte and the Five Great Powers were, that the continuance of their sway would not be advantageous to Syria; at all events, they were convinced that it would be advantageous to themselves; and no wonder, for the Emir Beschir had been guilty of every kind of corruption. There is no act of cruelty, oppression, extortion, and rapine that he was not—I believe justly—accused of. It appears that he caused on one occasion some individuals, members of his own family, to be seized and strapped down to a board, and their eyes to be put out with hot irons; and when one of them in his agony screamed louder than was altogether consistent with the Emir's repose, he directed his tongue to be slit in order to silence him. It was quite intelligible, therefore, that the Schehab family should not approve of this arrangement which had been agreed to by the Allies and the Porte, and that they should exert all the means their remaining wealth and influence in Syria gave them, for the purpose of bringing about their restoration to power. It is also easily to be understood that in a feudal country a great number of the chiefs who had profited under the dominion of that family should still retain a desire to have them restored to power. The power of the Emir had been profitable to those chiefs, and it was to be expected that a great outcry would be raised amongst the Maronites, with the view, if possible, to defeat the arrangement of 1842, and to restore to Syria the old system of government as carried on by the Emir Beschir. The Maronite clergy, too, had a similar interest; for their influence was likely to be greater while the whole country was under the rule of an Emir Beschir, than when the Druses had a chief of their own race and their own religion, and when the country was divided into two governments. All these parties, then, had a direct interest in defeating the arrangement of 1842. That arrangement being calculated to secure the well-being of Syria, and to render the people contented and happy, tended to render them obedient and loyal subjects, and to make them well-affected towards the Porte, and therefore it was conducive to the interests of the Turkish Government. It is not, however, to be expected that a Government like that of Turkey should always act in accordance with its own real interest. The important officers of the Turkish Government have personal interests of their own, separate from those of the State; and they felt that if neither of these two plans was to be adopted—if neither the Emir Beschir was to be restored, nor the two local governors were appointed, but if, on the other hand, a Turkish pacha were to be appointed to govern the whole of the district of the Lebanon, that government might become a source of profit to some of the officers of the Porte; and they took pains therefore, to represent it as likely to be more advantageous to the Porte itself, in point of revenue, than either of the other two courses. This was the calculation of corrupt and interested men—of ignorant men wholly blind or indifferent to the real interests of their country and their Sovereign: but it was the calculation of the Turkish officers; and therefore, in addition to the open resistance opposed to the intended arrangement by the Schehab family, and the Maronite clergy, came this under current of Turkish corruption and prejudice, and these together combined to create endless difficulties, delays, and obstacles to the arrangement proposed in 1842 by the Five Powers, and concurred in by the Porte. Well, Sir, unfortunately this resistance has prevailed—at the same time, I am bound to admit that the Turks do not appear to have done in these later times, for the purpose of defeating the arrangement, that which I fear it is proved they did in 1841—actually interfere to set one of these races in hostility against the other. In 1841, they instigated the Druses to attack the Maronites, with the view of weakening and disarming both parties—but especially with the view of reducing the power of the Maronites—intending, no doubt, when that object should have been accomplished, to turn upon the Druses, and disarm them in their turn. That, however, does not appear to have been the practice of the Turkish officers of late. On this occasion they have merely employed their influence as far as they could without glaring indecency exert it, to prevent the completion of that arrangement which the Porte promised the Allies to carry into effect. But, lately, the other influences I have spoken of appear to have produced an unfortunate effect. The Maronites, by the interest of the Schehabs and their friends, have obtained from some quarter or other large sums of money, and a fresh supply of arms and ammunition; possibly from the two Emirs Beschir, though they had been disarmed in their previous contest with the Druses. The Druses were armed also; a conflict of the most serious character took place, and for a time the whole of the country was a prey to all the horrors of civil war, This state of things appears to have been brought to an end for the moment, and a Convention has been concluded between the Druses and the Maronites under the mediation of the Turkish authorities; but still no effectual step has yet been taken to lay the foundation of any solid or permanent plan for securing the future peace of that unfortunate district. But what I contend is, that the Allied Powers, and especially the British Government, have not shown that energy they were entitled to display—and ought to have displayed—and which, if they had displayed, would, I think, have been attended with success. In saying this, however, I exempt from blame one officer of the British Government. There is one officer of that Government who has shown great activity, energy, and good sense, and has taken a just view of the state of things in the country where he is placed. I mean Colonel Rose, the British Consul General in Syria. I read with much satisfaction the despatches of that officer contained in the volume on the Table. I read them with much satisfaction, as I should naturally do any proof of the zeal and judgment of a British officer in the performance of his public duties; but the more so in this case, because Her Majesty was graciously pleased to appoint Colonel Rose during the period when I held the seals of the Foreign Office. I think the conduct of that officer throughout the whole affair is deserving of the greatest praise. On several occasions Colonel Rose was the means of preventing collision between the two contending parties. The advice he gave to the Turkish authorities has frequently prevented their doing very mischievous things, and taking steps that would necessarily have been attended with the most serious consequences; and, in one instance, by his own personal exertions—attended with great risk to himself—he had the good fortune and the happiness to save the lives of between 700 and 800 Maronites, whose dwellings had been burnt by the Druses, and who, if it had not been for his personal exertions, would have been victims of the cruelties of their enemies. But Colonel Rose, though displaying great ability and judgment himself, has not, I think, been well supported by such definite instructions from his Government as in his difficult position he was entitled to expect. It is true there are in the Papers on the Table several despatches approving of his conduct; but I see hardly any instructions to guide him. He seems, indeed, to have been left wholly to his own judgment and resources. No doubt the Government had entire confidence in that judgment; but Colonel Rose was entitled, in the peculiar circumstances in which he was placed, to receive not only approbation for what he had done, but some more especial and definite instructions as to the course which, in future, he was expected by his Government to pursue. Now, I do not see in any of these Papers, proofs that the British Government has shown that energy, acting in conjunction with its Four Allies, which, considering the nature of the Turkish character, it was necessary to display in order to put an end to this difficulty. Everybody who is at all acquainted with the habits of Turkish diplomatists, or has any knowledge of the dilatory character of the Turkish authorities in transacting affairs, must be aware that hints, inuendoes, suggestions, and side-wind propositions won't do. With such a people, if you wish to succeed, you must come at once to the point, and tell them what they are to do; and if you tell them also how they are to do it, and when they are to do it, they are still more likely to do it than if you leave the time and the mode to their own discretion. I say that the Allies were entitled to use different language to the Turkish Government, in this case, from that which they did use; they were entitled to press the matter as strongly as possible on the Turkish Government, and to tell them that they were trifling with the Allies, and were not sincerely acting upon their own promises and professions, and that something more distinct and effectual was expected from the Porte in carrying out the arrangements into which it had entered, than anything that had yet been done. Judging from former experience, I am justified in believing that if the Allies had adopted that course, many of the unfortunate events that have lately happened in Syria would have been prevented; and I say further, that unless some more energetic course be taken than has yet been had recourse to, Syria will continue to be a prey to those calamities with which it has of late been afflicted. I know there are some parties who think it is well to show, by the failure of all attempts to regulate the affairs of Syria, that the Turkish Government is not fitted to govern that country, and that it ought either to be given back to the rule of Mehemet Ali, or to be separated from the dominions of the Porte, and formed into an independent State. I am not for either of those courses. Neither of them would, in my opinion, conduce to the well-being of the Syrians themselves, or to the interests of the Turkish Empire. As an instance of what I have said as to the character of the instructions sent to Colonel Rose, I find that, on the 5th of June in the present year, a despatch was received at the Foreign Office from that officer, dated the 17th of May, 1845—an admirable despatch—giving the clearest and most perfectly developed view of the causes of the late insurrection. He states these causes to be, first, the misconduct of the Turkish Government—secondly, the intrigues of the Schehab family—thirdly, the difficulties arising out of the mixed location of the population—and, fourthly, the intrigues of the Maronite clergy. But he does not in this despatch state these things for the first time. These causes had been fully explained to the Government in previous despatches; but in this communication Colonel Rose sums up the whole at one view, and he gives shortly, but in the most clear and distinct manner, his reasons for charging to these four causes all the calamities that have befallen Syria. This despatch was received by the Government on the 5th of June; and what was the nature of the despatch which was written by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, on the following day, to Sir Stratford Canning? On the 6th of June, Lord Aberdeen writes to Sir S. Canning to the following effect:—

"The present state of affairs in Syria has occasioned much concern to Her Majesty's Government"—

It was scarcely necessary to tell him that—

"But they have been glad to perceive by the latest advices from Colonel Rose that measures were in progress for arresting the course of the hostilities which had broken out between the Druses and the Maronites."

This could not help much either Sir S. Canning or Col. Rose. But we expect some particular result—the Government having felt so much concern, and having had explained to them by Colonel Rose the causes that had produced the state of affairs in Syria, it was natural to expect that the Government would have instructed their Ambassador what to do, either in connexion with the Four other Great Powers, or with the Turkish Government, to prevent the recurrence of similar calamities. But what is the conclusion to which the British Secretary of State arrives?

"Until the result of those measures is known, and a clearer insight obtained into the various circumstances which have led to and attended these distressing transactions, Her Majesty's Government are unable to arrive at any certain conclusion as to the course which it may be proper to follow, with the view of obviating, if possible, a renewal of civil war in the Lebanon districts."

Greatly must Sir S. Canning have been assisted by this despatch—a despatch following a detailed account of all that had passed in the Lebanon; and a full explanation of the causes that had produced it. When Her Majesty's Government are informed of all the causes that have led to certain events, which events are also made known to them, one would think that they should be capable of suggesting efficient remedies to prevent the recurrence of similar disasters, and more especially when it is recollected that these things were by no means new to them. This despatch, received on the 5th of June, sums up the whole of the causes, but they had been fully explained to the Government in the previous correspondence. I say, then, that the Government have shown throughout these transactions an indifference, a torpidity, and a want of that lively sense of the difficulties they had to deal with, and of the duties they had to perform, which warrant us in throwing upon them a part of the responsibility which attaches on account of those calamities which have occasioned them so much concern. This subject is one of great importance; it belongs not only to an English interest, but to a great European interest. It interests all Europe that the integrity of the Turkish Empire should be maintained. I will not undertake to discuss whether the magnificent countries now under the Turkish dominion might or might not be better governed by a more civilized Power. If you could put Constantinople and the Turkish Empire under the sway of an enlightened Sovereign, acquainted with all the wants and requirements of civilized life, no doubt that important part of the world would be in a different condition from that in which it now is. But we must deal with things as they are, and the question we have to consider is, whether it is not conducive to the interests of Europe, and not only conducive to its interests, but essential to its safety, that we should do our best to maintain the existing state of things, rather than pull down the present fabric, in order to set up something else in its stead? We are told that the Turkish Empire is a dead body, that it is a rotten tree—every kind of metaphor is used for the purpose of showing that the Turkish Empire is falling into decay, and that the Great Powers of Europe must proceed to divide the spoil even before the breath is out of the body. But the answer to this is, it will last our time if you will only let it alone. If the stronger Powers of Europe will only concur to assist the Turkish Government in improving its system of administration, and in maintaining its territorial integrity, I am sure that, as long as any man now living is likely to exist, the great danger to the peace of Europe, which must result from the falling to pieces of the Turkish Empire, may be successfully averted. If Turkey were likely to become what she was in past times—a great military and aggressive power, formidable to neighbouring nations—I could understand the policy of reducing its strength; but that is impossible; and those Powers who have interests in connexion with Turkey should deem it more to their advantage to have a quiet neighbour, which Turkey will always be, rather than to have an active and dangerous one. Those who say that the Turks are going backward in civilization, are in error. Compare the state of Turkey now with what it was half a century ago, and you will find, that in all that constitutes political and social civilization, Turkey is making, not rapid perhaps, but decided progress, in imitation of the Powers of Europe. Security to life and property is greater now than it ever was at any previous period in Turkey. The rule of the Turkish officers is now free from the arbitrary infliction of the penalty of death, which not many years ago was common. Schools are established; the army is organized upon the European model; instruction is given to the officers of the navy, and the hatti scheriff of Gulhanè, recently issued, gives guarantees to the life and property even of the Raya subjects. In fact, few countries have made so much progress in civilization within a given time as the Turkish Empire. Then, I say, give that progress fair play, and enable the Turkish Government to continue the course which it has entered upon. It is necessary that the Five Powers should in all respects be agreed; and I am glad to see, from those Papers, that in these affairs of Syria they are agreed. The Treaty of the Dardanelles, signed July 1841, between England, France, Austria, Russia, and Prussia, was, in effect, a record of the determination of those Powers to abandon all selfish views, and to unite together for the common purpose of preserving the Turkish Empire as it stands, and of assisting in securing the dominions of the Sultan. None of the Five Powers have any true interest in pursuing any other course. It may be looked upon as a moral certainty, that if any one of the Five Great Powers of Europe were to pursue a separate course with regard to any part of the Turkish dominions, under the expectation of gaining some selfish advantage thereby—in the first place, the advantage would be as nothing, if gained; and in the next, any such attempt would inevitably excite so much jealousy, so much ill-will and resistance on the part of the other Great Powers, that that one Power, would find itself vigorously opposed, and its endeavours successfully thwarted. But I am not afraid of any such event. I perceive here in these Papers, that all the Five Powers cordially, honestly, and sincerely concur in recommending to the Porte measures in regard to Syria which must tend to the advantage of the Sultan. Therefore, what is wanted is, not a correct understanding of what ought to be done, and not, perhaps, a good intention to do it, but that degree of energy in executing a purpose, without which the talents of the most able man can be but of little use, and the best intentions must be unprofitable. Therefore, feeling that those disturbances in Syria are of great moment, as bearing upon the tranquillity of Turkey, and that the tranquillity of Turkey is of high importance as connected with the preservation of the balance of power and with the maintenance of peace in Europe, I have felt it my duty on this, the last occasion on which during this Session I shall be able to do so, to state to the House that I think the Government have not shown in this matter that active energy which the nature of the case requires; and to express my hope, that when the House shall meet again, we shall have had no recurrence of these disasters and calamities in Syria, and that that arrangement which was recommended by the Five Powers, and acquiesced in by the Sultan, and which, I am persuaded, if carried into execution, would restore peace and tranquillity in Syria, will have been practically carried into effect; and by that means, we shall be relieved from the engagements by which we are now bound to the Syrian people, and from that perpetual interference with the affairs of another and a friendly State, which is inconsistent with ordinary and just international usage, but which is in this case pressed upon us by the course of events, and by engagements which we are bound to fulfil. The noble Lord concluded by moving for the Papers he had described.

Sir R. Peel: Sir, I understand the noble Lord to admit that he finds in the Papers which have been lately presented to the House sufficient proof that the Five Great Powers of Europe, standing as they do in a peculiar relation with the Turkish Empire, have acted together in cordial concert, and that no one of them has been actuated by any desire to gain for itself any particular advantage; and that acting so in concert, they have offered advice to the Turkish Government, which, if adopted, would tend to promote the true interests of the Porte, and, at the same time, conduce to the restoration of tranquillity, and inspire a just confidence in the Government of the Porte. The noble Lord admits that he finds proof of this in the Papers on the Table of the House; but he says the Five Powers are not sufficiently energetic—they are not sufficiently decisive and determined in enforcing the advice they have so given. Now the relation in which the Allies stand to the Porte is a peculiar and a delicate one. You have to require from the Porte the fulfilment of certain engagements into which she has entered; but the sole end and object of your policy is to maintain the integrity of the Turkish Empire—and we have consequently imposed upon us this somewhat contradictory duty, we have to require the fulfilment on the part of the Porte of certain engagements into which it has entered relating to its own international affairs, and at the same time to promote the integrity and independence of the Turkish Empire. The latter consideration—the wish to promote the independence, and maintain the integrity of the Turkish Empire—may suggest itself as the reason why the Five Great European Powers, acting in concert, and giving to the Porte the best advice in their power, have been slow in adopting those measures which might be effectual in compelling obedience on the part of the Porte, but which might at the same time be fatal to its integrity and independence. When we delivered over Syria to the government of the Porte in 1839 and 1840, we could hardly have anticipated that the rule of the Porte over its Syrian subjects would be altogether satisfactory. I will not now call in question the policy which induced you to rescue Syria from the dominion of the Egyptians. I admit you had not merely to say whether the Egyptian rule of Syria was good or not, but whether you were prepared to rescue the Turkish Empire from the peril it was in from the advance of Mehemet Ali into its territories. You found the Egyptian troops under Ibrahim Pacha advancing into Syria in large force, which you thought the Porte had not sufficient means of resisting successfully; you found a conflict had actually taken place, in which the Egyptian troops had been victorious; and the question you had to decide was, whether, under the circumstances, the security of the Turkish Empire was not endangered, and whether the permanent interests of Europe, and the peace of Europe, did not require the immediate interposition of the European Powers, in order to arrest the advance of the Egyptian troops, and to maintain the integrity of the Turkish Empire? That, I apprehend, was the ground upon which, in 1839 and 1840, you determined to interpose, in favour of Turkey, first your good offices, and then your active interference. You may have been justified in doing this; danger might have arisen to Europe from the continued success of the Egyptians, and the imminent danger to the Turkish Empire may have justified you in delivering over the Syrians again to the Porte; but the main and pressing danger to Europe formed the ground on which you interposed to rescue the Porte from the danger in which it was placed. But you surely never anticipated that the domestic government of Syria by the Porte would be very easy or satisfactory. What have you done with respect to Greece? You found the Turkish Government so unfit to conduct the government of Greece, that this country, with France and Russia, interfered to establish Greece as an independent Power, and that on account of its misgovernment by Turkey — the continued anarchy in which the country was plunged, and the failure of the Turkish Government to put it down. Well, you determined to restore Turkish dominion in Syria; but immediately after the restoration of that dominion, when it might have been supposed that Turkey would have felt some gratitude to this country and the other Powers, did Turkey show any strong disposition to administer the affairs of Syria in the manner in which English statesmen might have wished them to be administered? The noble Lord has himself adverted to the state of Syria at that time, and to the disappointment of the assurances he had received from the Porte. After the rescue of the Porte from imminent peril, and the assurances which had been given by it that the government of Syria should be satisfactory—at that time, before the first bloom of gratitude was rubbed off, did the noble Lord find reason to congratulate himself on the conduct of the Porte, in reference to its promises to govern Syria properly? On the 25th of May, 1841, Lord Ponsonby wrote to Lord Palmerston in these terms:—

"Therapia, May 23, 1841.

"I have this evening (and fortunately in time for the messenger) extremely bad news from Syria. I must be as brief as possible. Reschid Pasha sent as governor to Damascus Hadji Nejid Pasha, a man who had been during many years Kapou Kiaja to Mehemet Ali (Pasha of Egypt). He has ordered the Christians not to enter Damascus on horseback, and prohibited the wearing any coloured clothes of a light and gay colour, and to dress in black, as in former days. . . . . I entreat you to speak in the strongest terms to Chekib, for it is too bad that Nejib should be permitted to insult the Christians to whom his Sovereign is indebted for Syria, and be the cause of undoing all that we have done with so much trouble, for assuredly Syria will revolt if these men are allowed to act so as to irritate the whole Syrian nation." . . . .

That, then, was the result of what took place. On this point I am sure every one will agree with me, that though Mehemet Ali practised much cruelty, he still was able to maintain a sufficient army to prevent anarchy and to control rebellion. You handed over Syria to the Porte; but nothing was more difficult than to invest the Porte with the power of governing Syria, and to do that without interfering in the domestic affairs of Turkey greatly increased the difficulty. In almost the last despatch of Lord Ponsonby, I find a remarkable confirmation of this, contained in the following passage:—

"I have further learned that the greatest dissatisfaction exists amongst the mountaineers and others in consequence of the non-execution of the promises generally of which Mr. Wood was the bearer. I have in consequence thought it right to detain here Mr. Wood, knowing that his return to Syria must be very mischievous in its effects under such circumstances; for the Syrians would demand from him why his promises are not performed, and Mr. Wood must either allow the Syrians to hold him a liar and deceiver, and to charge the British Ambassador, and even Her Majesty's Government, with deceit and falsehood, or Mr. Wood must declare that the Porte is guilty of breaking its promises, and by so doing there would be an end put to the respite from mischief that has been obtained by the suspense in which the Syrians have been still held, and the hopes they have still nourished that we here should succeed in obtaining for them what had been promised to them. I thought it right to give the Ottoman Ministers credit for their repeated declarations, that Nejib Pasha and the other functionaries in Syria should be obliged to act in conformity with the spirit and letter of the promises of the Sublime Porte; but day after day, week after week, months have passed away, and nothing has been done. I have, therefore, given in to the Sublime Porte an official note, pointing out the evils that would ensue from the return of Mr. Wood to Syria, and further stating that not one of the arrangements agreed upon at the meeting held by the Internuncio and the Russian Minister and myself, and which were communicated to the Sublime Porte and accepted by the Porte, had as yet been acted upon, and terminating with the request that the Sublime Porte will give me a clear and satisfactory answer."

That was the state of things towards the close of Lord Ponsonby's embassy. This was followed by several promises, on which we relied, for the fulfilment of the engagements entered into with us; but those engagements have, unfortunately, not been fulfilled. I have no excuse to offer for their not being fulfilled; and I wish we had nothing else to lay to the charge of the Porte than a want of ability to fulfil those engagements. I do not know whether there is not even something worse than apathy in the case; there may be some worse motive, perhaps; but there can be no doubt of the fact that there have been a great many shabby evasions with respect to our pecuniary claims upon Turkey, and I do not see any grounds upon which I can vindicate the conduct of the Porte; at the same time, I cannot shut my eyes to the difficulty of enforcing compliance without endangering the independence of Turkey. Before I proceed to another topic, however, I must bear testimony to the zeal and ability which Sir Stratford Canning has shown in the conduct of those affairs; and, I think, the House ought also to be made aware of the great influence which he has acquired, and the resentments which he has disarmed by the candour he has always shown, and the purity of motive which at all times seemed to govern his conduct. With respect to Colonel Rose, in reference to the affairs of the Lebanon, I am bound to do him the justice of saying that the manner in which he discharged the important duties entrusted to him merits the highest confidence. He performed those duties at great personal sacrifices and great personal risk. It was said, that Colonel Rose had not received sufficiently clear instructions; need I remind the House of the extreme difficulty of giving instructions in such cases? The danger and vicissitudes which were hourly taking place, precluded the possibility of rendering those instructions precise or definite. To such places you must send men in whom you repose entire confidence, for it is impossible to give definite instructions to suit every contingency. Before the instructions could arrive, the state of things for which they were intended would be totally changed. The conduct of Colonel Rose and the state of affairs in Lebanon are, I think, clearly shown in the following passage from the Papers on the Table of the House. Sir S. Canning wrote on September 17, 1844, and his remarks may in addition tend to show how rapid are the changes both in Syria and at Constantinople:—

"By the return of Omar Effendi from Beyrout, I received from Colonel Rose the gratifying intelligence that the deputies of the Maronites and Druses had accepted the terms of arrangement communicated to them by the Capitan Pasha and the Pasha of Sidon in the name of the Porte, and that the long-pending question of Mount Lebanon might be considered as brought to a satisfactory termination. I observe with particular satisfaction that the Porte has redeemed its pledge; that the generosity of its conduct has removed the chief burden of the indemnities; that, in addition to the confirmation of all previous securities and concessions, the liberty of emigration has been granted to the Maronites in the mixed districts, and that the tranquillity of the country has been secured by the presence of an imposing force, without the slightest effusion of blood. The Ottoman Ministers are much pleased with the solution of the difficulty; and they have conveyed to me their acknowledgments for the share which Her Majesty's Government and its representatives, both here and in Syria, have taken in bringing it about. In answer to an inquiry from Rifaat Pasha, I have advised an early and complete execution of the promises made at Beyrout, especially as regards the payment of the indemnities, and that large proportion of their amount which the Porte has undertaken to supply. I abstain for the present from entering more largely into this part of the question. It appears to me that while the Porte continues to pursue so reasonable and benevolent a course, the smallest measure of interference will be best on my part. I shall nevertheless endeavour to keep its proceedings in view, and I shall not hesitate on every proper occasion to offer those suggestions which I may think most conducive to the peace and welfare of Mount Lebanon."

Those are the sentiments which my noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office has a right to entertain with respect to the conduct of the Porte; but it would appear that a total change has taken place since the period to which this despatch refers. The noble Lord seems to think, by some observations which fell from him, that Her Majesty's Ministers have not shown themselves sufficiently alive to Colonel Rose's merits, and have not acknowledged his services in terms adequate to their value. I am happy to be able to state, with reference to this particular topic, that my noble Friend has very recently received a letter from Colonel Rose, showing that, at all events, such was not the impression which prevailed in his mind on that subject. In justice to Colonel Rose, I hope the House will permit me to read a portion of this despatch, which I hold in my hand, and which is dated July 1, 1845:—

"I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's despatches No. 6 and 7, in which your Lordship is so good as to inform me that Her Majesty's Government are pleased to approve entirely the steps which I have taken, in conjunction with my Colleagues, to restore peace to the Lebanon, and also that Her Majesty's Government are pleased to bestow the same gracious approbation on the steps which I took for causing the safe passage to Beyrout of a large number of the Christian inhabitants of Abbaye. Such approbation, and conveyed in such terms, I venture to say, has caused me the sincerest satisfaction, and is a fresh proof of the support which Her Majesty's Government invariably have given to their servants, when they are engaged in the cases of unforeseen difficulty which arise from the state of this distracted country."

The next passage which I shall read will show what the result of Colonel Rose's interference was; an interference, be it observed, not exercised exclusively in favour of the Druses, as has been asserted, but impartially, and in behalf of the Christian population in general:—

"As regards the protection which I gave to the Christians of Abbaye, I have the more reason to rejoice that I did that which has procured me such most gratifying proofs of approbation, as I have since received information, which makes it certain that the Druse Sheikh Hamoud Abouneked, known for his cruelties and treacheries in the war of 1841, would have plundered and cut off the Christians, if I had not been with them. 400 Druses had been detached by him to the pass of Damoor, and 300 to that of Naame, to fall on the defenceless column."

Colonel Rose subsequently had an interview with the chief, Hamoud Abouneked, who, he thought, from previous occurrences, was likely to oppose his affording effectual protection to the Christians under his care; but he prevented that person from carrying his intentions into effect; and in concluding his despatch he thus proceeds:—

"I not only act in the interests of justice and humanity as regards the Christians, but, by making the Druses feel the weight of a just authority when they act cruelly or unjustly, I act for their real interest, for I take the best means of preventing causes of present and future dissensions between the Christians and Druses; and, moreover, I prevent their getting into that state of lawlessness and insubordination which afforded Mustapha Pasha a pretext for treacherously arresting them. But there is another advantage in my mode of proceeding. I give the Druses further proof of what I have so constantly inculcated on them, that, whilst Her Majesty's Government desire that they should be placed on a footing of just equality with the other inhabitants of the Lebanon, the best guarantee of peace, they will, in the same spirit of impartial justice and policy, use all their influence to repress the commission of all conduct of a cruel or oppressive nature by the Druses towards their Christian neighbours, and vice versâ as regards the Christians."

That is the manner in which this honourable and efficient officer carries into effect his mission. He does not give his protection to one party only. He affords it alike to all at the moment when it is needed. He impresses the Turkish authorities with the absolute necessity of not violating that shelter which he had thrown over these unhappy persons, and he even encounters very considerable personal risks in order to carry out his determination to afford protection to these Maronite fugitives. His conduct is deserving of every praise, and it is a sufficient refutation of the charges brought against him of having afforded protection to one class only of the two contending factions in the Lebanon. I confess, Sir, that I am more than unwilling to enter into any further details with respect to the past conduct of the Porte. The unanimity of the Five Powers in the course of policy which it has been recommended to the Porte to pursue, is a decisive proof of their disinterestedness. The last accounts which have been received from Sir Stratford Canning by Her Majesty's Government, lead me to hope that some proposals will be very shortly made by the Porte for the settlement of the Lebanon; proposals which, unlike all those that have preceded them, may ultimately and effectually put an end to the differences which have so long prevailed there. This despatch, however, is of so recent a date, that I cannot speak of the subject of its contents with positive confidence; but the tenor of Sir Stratford Canning's letter, which is dated 31st of July last, dwells on the sincerity with which Chekib Effendi promised to enter into the desired measures for the tranquillization of the Lebanon; and these being the most recent advices from Her Majesty's Minister at Constantinople, and it being obviously the interests of the Porte to propose a plan which shall be equitable and effectual for the settlement of these long-existing differences, I consider it the most advisable course to abstain from entering any further into this subject at present. But, at the same time, I will say, that taking into consideration the political condition of Syria, it is manifestly to the interest of all the Five Powers who were instrumental in handing that country over to the Porte, that they should see an equitable and impartial Government established there; and it will be a most surprising circumstance if the remonstrances, and even the entreaties of the Five Powers, should be any longer neglected. I have no other observation to make on the Motion of the noble Lord, except to say that I have no objection to the production of the Papers which he asks for. At the same time, it will probably be better not to include the four or five despatches which have passed since the last accounts were received; and, if this exception be made, I shall, at an early period of the ensuing Session, have no objection to produce the whole correspondence. As this is the last opportunity which I shall probably have of addressing the House, I cannot suffer the labours of this Session to close without saying a few words on the subject of those labours. I more particularly refer to the exertions made by those hon. Members who have taken part in the private business of this House since the Session began. We who occupy the Treasury Benches are, perhaps, equally engaged in our duties with other hon. Members; but then our situation in this House is more conspicuous; the subjects which occupy our attention are more popular, excite more interest in the public mind; their success is more gratifying, and insures a higher species of reward than do the cares and fatigues of attending private business. But I must, at the same time, say, that I doubt very much whether the services which we have rendered are of a more important or more engrossing character, than those which have been afforded so assiduously and continuously by the general body of hon. Members. I am now speaking, not only of the attendances at the Committees on Railway Bills, but of the general superintendence of the private business of the House. No one thinks, for instance, anything of the business transacted by the Standing Orders' Committee; the debates in this House on those Standing Orders possess no interest, and consequently convey no impression of labour; but only look at the general results of the Session, and the House will feel convinced that I am not overrating the value of the labours to which I refer, when I characterize them as unequalled in duration and in importance. The Standing Orders' Committee sat 39 days, and had 185 cases referred (ordinary number referred 60). The Committee of Selection sat 41 days, and had 315 Bills (ordinary number 180). The Committee on Petitions sat more days than the other two. 45 Railway Group Committees have sat, which, with 5 Members in each, made a total of 225 Members. There were 163 Bills decided one way or the other, besides those withdrawn, those unsupported, and those thrown out on Standing Orders. Taking the 163 Bills only, and supposing they had not been grouped, the 163 Bills would have required, at the reduced number of five, 815

Members. Of the Committees, 22 sat under 6 days, 9 between 6 and 12 days, 6 between 12 and 18 days, 3 between 18 and 24 days, 5 sat above 24 days; and to the honour, be it said, of the Members who composed it, one of these Committees sat 83 days. I think, therefore, that the Standing Orders' Committee and the other Committees, the members of which, much to their credit, have attended regularly and without compulsion to those duties, and who have discharged them with such signal success, are entitled before the Session closes to an expression of gratitude for their labours; and I believe I may constitute myself the organ by means of which this sentiment is conveyed to them, and assure those hon. Members thus publicly that this House and the country at large do ample justice to their motives in thus sacrificing their time and energies to the despatch of the important business transacted by them; and I believe, if a comparison were to be instituted between the character of this House now in respect to these matters, and what it was when first elected, I think a very advantageous deduction would be drawn as to its increased capacity for the advancement of the business of the country. I believe it would be as impossible to impugn the character of this House on the ground of private business, as it would be injurious to do so with regard to the public affairs of the State: and I think the hon. Members who have taken their share in that private business are fully entitled to carry away with them the gratifying reflection that they have not only done their duty, but that they have contributed to raise the character of the House of Commons in the eyes of the whole nation.

Sir C. Napier was about to address the House, when

A Member moved that the House be counted; and twenty-five Members only being present, the House adjourned at a quarter to eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Saturday, August 9, 1845.

MINUTES.] BILLS. Public.—Received the Royal Assent.—Exchequer Bills; Consolidated Fund (Appropriation); Small Debts; Silk Weavers.

Private.—Received the Royal Assent.—Epping Railway; Bristol Parochial Rates; Marquess of Westminster's Estate.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. From Inhabitants of Lanfechell, for the Establishment of Local Courts, and praying that the Judges appointed may be required to have a knowledge of the Welsh Language.

PROROGATION OF THE PARLIAMENT.] This being the day announced for the prorogation of Parliament by the Queen in Person, the usual arrangements were made within the House for the reception of Her Majesty.

The Queen entered the House, attended by the Great Officers of State, shortly before two o'clock, and being seated on the Throne, directed the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, through the Lord Chamberlain, to command the attendance of the Commons.

Mr. Speaker, accompanied by a great number of the Commons appeared at the Bar, and addressed Her Majesty as follows:—

"Most Gracious Sovereign—We, your Majesty's loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled, attend your Majesty with the concluding Bill of Supply for the present year.

"The Session we are about to close has been rendered unusually laborious, by the rapid development of private enterprise, in extending the railway communications of the Kingdom. We anticipate the most beneficial results from the facilities thus afforded to the internal trade of the country; and we havedevoted much time and labour to the legislation requisite for the construction and regulation of these important works, notwithstanding the various measures of great public interest which demanded our attentive consideration.

"Your Majesty was graciously pleased to intimate to us at the commencement of the Session, that your Majesty had carried into effect, in the spirit in which it was conceived, the Act for the more effectual application of Charitable Donations and Bequests. In the same spirit we have continued to legislate for Ireland; and in making a further grant for the endowment of Maynooth, and in providing the means of academical instruction, we have shown due regard to the peculiar circumstances of that part of the United Kingdom, and the religious feelings of the majority of its inhabitants; and we believe that the encouragement afforded by this and former Parliaments to the education of the people, has placed the future improvement and prosperity of Ireland on a sure and lasting foundation.

"Our attention has been no less anxiously directed to the condition of the destitute poor of Scotland; and, assisted by the information which your Majesty has directed to be laid before us, we have made such amendments in the law as will provide for the more effectual relief of the poor, and for a better system of parochial management under the control of a general Board of Supervision.

"We have endeavoured, by facilitating the drainage of lands and the enclosure of commons, to encourage agricultural improvement and the beneficial employment of labour in the rural districts. And we advert with peculiar satisfaction to the measures which have been adopted for the further security and extension of the trade and commerce of the country.

"The laws passed in a former Session for regulating the banking establishments of England have been applied with certain requisite modifications to Scotland and Ireland. The operations of trade have been simplified and rendered more secure by the abolition of the duties on many articles of import, and by the consolidation of the Customs laws.

"The duties on sugar have been so far modified and reduced as materially to affect its price and increase its consumption; and the important staple manufacture of glass has been relieved altogether from fiscal charge and the inconvenience and expense of Excise regulations.

"To meet the deficiency in the Revenue caused by these alterations of the Tariff, we have deemed it indispensably necessary to continue for a further period the tax upon income; and we have been thereby enabled, in accordance with your Majesty's suggestion, to add to the efficiency of the naval service, and to afford adequate protection to our commerce.

"It has been my duty thus briefly to lay before your Majesty some of the most prominent measures of the Session. We believe them to be well calculated, under the blessing of Providence, to increase the prosperity of the country, and to promote the welfare and happiness of all classes of your Majesty's subjects: and, if we have felt ourselves reluctantly compelled to renew a tax usually resorted to under the pressure of an expensive war, we have at least the satisfaction of reflecting that we have reimposed it for no purpose of aggrandizement or of conquest; but that we might be enabled, without endangering public credit, to relax those restrictions which press upon our domestic industry, to extend our commercial relations, and to share the blessings of peace with all the nations of the world."

The Royal Assent was then given, in the usual form, to the Exchequer Bills Bill, the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill, the Small Debts Bill, the Silk Weavers Bill, the Epping Railway Bill, the Bristol Parochial Rates Bill, and the Marquess of Westminster's Estate Bill.

Her Majesty was then pleased to make the following Most Gracious Speech to both Houses of Parliament:—

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"I rejoice that the State of Public Business enables Me to release you from further Attendance in Parliament.

"In closing this laborious Session, I must express to you My warm Acknowledgments for the Zeal and Assiduity with which you have applied yourselves to the Consideration of many Subjects deeply affecting the Public Welfare.

"I have given My cordial Assent to the Bills which you presented to Me for remitting the Duties on many Articles of Import, and for removing Restrictions on the free Application of Capital and Skill to certain Branches of our Manufactures.

"The Reduction of Taxation will necessarily cause an immediate Loss of Revenue, but I trust that its Effect in stimulating Commercial Enterprize and enlarging the Means of Consumption will ultimately provide an ample Compensation for any temporary Sacrifice.

"I have witnessed with peculiar Satisfaction the unremitting Attention which you have bestowed on the Measures recommended by Me to your Consideration at the Commencement of the Session, for improving and extending the Means of Academical Education in Ireland.

"You may rely upon My Determination to carry those Measures into execution in the Manner best calculated to inspire Confidence in the Institutions which have received your Sanction, and to give Effect to your earnest Desire to promote the Welfare of that Part of My Dominions.

"From all Foreign Powers, I continue to receive Assurances of their friendly Disposition towards this Country.

The Convention which I have recently concluded with the King of the French, for the more effectual Suppression of the Slave Trade, will, I trust, by establishing a cordial and active Co-operation between the Two Powers, afford a better prospect than has hitherto existed of complete Success in the Attainment of an Object for which this Country has made so many Sacrifices.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I thank you for the Liberality with which you have voted the Supplies for the Service of the current Year.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"On your Return to your several Counties, Duties will devolve upon you scarcely less important than those from the Performance of which I now relieve you.

"I feel assured that you will promote and confirm, by your Influence and Example, that Spirit of Loyalty and Contentment which you will find generally prevalent throughout the Country.

"In the Discharge of all the Functions intrusted to you for the Public Welfare, you may confidently rely on My cordial Support; and I implore the Blessing of Divine Providence on our united Efforts to encourage the Industry and increase the Comforts of My People, and to inculcate those Religious and Moral Principles which are the surest Foundation of our Security and Happiness."

Then the Lord Chancellor, by Her Majesty's Command, said—

"It is Her Majesty's royal Will and Pleasure that the present Parliament be prorogued to Thursday, the Second Day of October next, and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Thursday, the Second Day of October next."

Her Majesty then rose from the Throne, and left the House attended in the same manner as upon Her entry.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Saturday, August 9, 1845.

MINUTES.] PETITIONS PRESENTED. By Mr. Hawes, from several places, for Establishment of County Courts.

EDUCATION IN IRELAND.] Mr. Wyse moved for Returns of the sums contributed and expended for the establishment and maintenance of the diocesan schools in Ireland, distinguishing such as had been contributed by the clergy of the Established Church, by grand juries, and by pupils respectively. These returns were necessary to complete those for which he moved yesterday, and he called for them thus in time, in order to enable him at an early period in the ensuing Session to resume the question which he had on many former occasions pressed upon the House, the reform and extension of the Diocesan and Royal Schools, and of the dissolution of the Board of Commissioners, under whom they were placed, with the view of making these schools more useful to the general purposes of Irish education. Though the new Colleges (Ireland) Act provided for an important class of education, there was a large space still unoccupied, intermediate between these institutions and the elementary schools, and this interval he wished to see filled up by the Diocesan and Royal Schools, when duly enlarged and reformed, and by such additions to them, on the same principle and in the same class, as might be sufficient to supply the public wants in this department, under the name of County Academies, in every county in Ireland. The Report of the Committee of 1836 and 1838 had gone at great length into the whole of that question; and, after showing the actual defects, had pointed out their remedy. He, as Chairman of that Committee, had spared no opportunity, not only of examining into facts, but into opinions relative to these schools, and he believed no serious difficulty would interfere to prevent the carrying out the alterations and improvements which he ventured to suggest relative to that branch of education in the Report. He did not think that the Commissioners themselves, who were not to be confounded with the Board of Commissioners of National Education, would oppose the dissolution of their body, and the placing the whole under the one administration of the latter. The reform of this department was, in all cases, necessary. It was as requisite on the one side to complete the system, as the opening of the Dublin University on the other. The Government had already given evidence of their desire to reform and extend the higher departments of education sufficient to justify him in hoping that they would not neglect this addition to the project, but that during the recess they would give it their anxious attention, with the view, if possible, at an early period, of carrying it with the same resolution into effect, as the Colleges Bill. In any case he should not fail to bring it again, pursuant to his Notice, in the hope of better success under the consideration of the House, as soon as Parliament should reassemble. There was another class of schools (he meant industrial schools) for which he felt the greatest interest. He believed, of all others, they were the most appropriate to the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of Ireland; and were better calculated than any other to render practically useful amongst the population the lessons they had received in the other schools. Private individuals had done much for their establishment and maintenance; and there was one in the north, and another in the west of Ireland, under the superintendence of a Catholic clergymen, which, he had no doubt, would do infinite good; but he wished to see the Government, also, zealously co-operate both in establishing themselves, through the National Board, such institutions, and aiding the establishment of them by others. In this hope, he had called for returns, somewhat similar to those moved for in reference to the diocesan and royal schools. He was anxious to bring them into something like a regularly organized system; on one side in connexion with the elementary and promised model schools, and the Board of Education; and on the other, with the new Colleges and the Agricultural Association. He trusted the Government would also give them their attentive consideration during the recess, with the view to provide more largely for their better organization and greater extension, both in the form of schools or colleges throughout the country. Before he sat down, he would take the liberty of once more adverting to the new Colleges. He wished to have a more explicit declaration from the Government of their intentions, relative to the carrying out of the plan (now happily a law of the realm); and which he trusted would soon demand their attention. The right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir J. Graham) had more than once stated his full assent to what he had ventured most strenuously to impress on the House—the absolute necessity, in the execution of the Act, to frame laws or statutes, and to constitute the governing body or bodies, in such a way as should fully deserve and meet the sanction and concurrence of the different classes and persuasions for whom they were designed. The best intentions, the highest object, the most perfect machinery, would be valueless without such condition. The right hon. Baronet had generally stated his desire to act on this indispensable principle; he felt, therefore, the less apprehension that he would decline at present stating to the House in what manner he proposed to carry this principle out. He would, therefore, both for his own satisfaction, and he supposed also for that of the public, ask the right hon. Baronet, whether he intended to lay the charter of incorporation and statute on the Table of the House early in the ensuing Session; and, in forming the governing body of the Colleges, whether he proposed to constitute one central body, or several local bodies, and of whom such body or bodies, when formed, were to be composed?

Sir James Graham stated, that as only a few days had elapsed since the Royal Assent had been given to the Act for the establishment of new Colleges in Ireland, the charter for the incorporation of these Colleges had not yet been prepared. It was the intention, as it would be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to lay copies of those charters before both Houses of Parliament. Instead of one visitatorial board, it was intended to appoint separate visitatorial boards for each district, those boards to be composed of lay and clerical persons, locally acquainted with the wants of each district. The right hon. Baronet took this opportunity of stating, in answer to a question put to him a few nights since, by the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe), with respect to the infringement of the recent Statute by the employment of females in the collieries near Prescott—the fact had been stated correctly by the hon. Member for Finsbury; and the parties who had been guilty of the infringement of the law, were now in course of prosecution by the colliery inspectors.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO THE CONTINENT.] Mr. Borthwick said, the right hon. Baronet who had just sat down had given him a lesson in Parliamentary tactics which he would not fail on a proper occasion to put in practice. What was most important was, that he the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) had made it impossible for him to bring under the consideration of the House, and of the right hon. Gentleman who had just entered (Sir R. Peel), the great constitutional question alluded to in the Notice which stood in his name. He meant the necessity of appointing Lords Justices in cases of the temporary absence of Her Most Gracious Majesty from her dominions, according to the Constitution and invariable usage of the realm. The noble Lord the Member for the city of London, had in the course of a speech delivered a few nights ago, with a delicacy at once and a courage which well became his position and his name, made a pointed allusion to this grave matter. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had in his reply made no observation whatever upon that part of the noble Lord's speech; and he had been in hopes that the silence he alluded to indicated, if not acquiescence in the noble Lord's views, at least that the subject was under the serious consideration of the Government. There was not time left for him now to enter at all upon the subject in detail; but his duty compelled him to say thus much. Notwithstanding the high authorities which he had seen alleged in favour of the opposite opinion, he believed that the Constitution as well as practice required the authority of the Crown to be exercised within the realm. Constitutional law, like civil law, was to be interpreted not only by the written maxim of the Statute, but by the unwritten authority of prescription. From the earliest periods to which the Constitution of England could be, traced there was not one exception to sanction the absence of the Sovereign without a delegated power to act in certain cases. The Act of Settlement, indeed, in so far as it bound the Sovereign to remain within the realm, unless by special sanction of Parliament, had been repealed. But the great constitutional principle for which he contended, namely, that the functions of the Crown could only be exercised within the realm, interwoven as that principle was with the whole frame of the State, and sanctioned without a single exception as he had shown it to be by uniform precedent, had never been altered or repealed. He could not hope, from all he heard, at this period to do more than record a protest; but his object would be to a great extent gained, if he obtained from the right hon. Baronet some assurance that the present example would not be drawn into a precedent for future times. That he might be able to obtain that assurance he would now say no more, except to congratulate the House and the country that in the present state of things there was not likely to arise any practical evil, such as had existed before, and as might befal posterity, if the integrity of the principle for which he contended was not maintained. He prayed, as did all her subjects, with one heart, for the happiness and safety of the Queen.

Sir R. Peel: I hope the hon. Gentleman will not attribute the abruptness of my reply to any want of courtesy towards him, but rather to the shortness of the time which I can now occupy the attention of the House. I will begin at once by saying that the hon. Gentleman is wrong on every single point which he has thought proper to advance. First of all, he is wrong, utterly wrong, in point of precedent. He said that there was no instance where the Sovereign had been absent from the realm, and where a Commission of the Lords Justices had not been appointed. Now, Sir, that is not the fact. The hon. Gentleman says he will go back to the earliest periods of the history of our Constitution. I cannot say what he means by Constitution, but there are instances within—

Here the Usher of the Black Rod appeared at the Table, and summoned the House to appear in the House of Lords, to hear Her Majesty prorogue the Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, followed by the Members present, proceeded forthwith to the House of Lords, and on his return read Her Majesty's Speech; after which the House separated at eighteen minutes past two o'clock, and the Parliament stood prorogued.
